Falcitelli is quick to dispel the biggest myth about Gladstone's: "People think we're expensive because they see how nice it looks, but we can accommodate all budgets."

"Nice" is perhaps a modest understatement for the restaurant's warm, natural tones of leather, wood and slate. Understated lighting, a cozy fireplace conversation area and a live pianist add to the charm, while a 30-foot sushi bar lends variety to the dining and event menu.

With so many non-kosher venues available to host simchahs, it may be tempting to look for a non-kosher setting and simply order specially prepared kosher meals for those who need them.

"But the quality is not the same when you're just reheating the [kosher] food," Falcitelli says.

And at Gladstone's, there's no need to do that – everybody can share an exquisite dining experience, without singling out anyone who's eating kosher.

Gladstone's: Showpiece of the local community.

Even the wines match the fine dining label: "We don't carry any bad wines." And a sommelier can recommend wines to accompany any meal. "You could have the best wine in the world, but if it doesn't complement the food, it's lost."

Falcitelli ran his own restaurant, Acceso, in the location where Gladstone's is now, until current owner Raphy Amar bought him out. Initially concerned about closing on Friday and Saturday nights, prime time for most successful restaurants, Falcitelli has realized that Gladstone's loyal customers "live by the same rules we do" and do their share to make up the difference between Sunday and Thursday.

When it comes to keeping kosher, "work with what you have" has become his motto, whether it's applied to wines or the reality of creating distinctive non-dairy desserts. "We have all the desserts that you would not expect."

Whether it's crème brulée or chocolate mousse, there are many options for creating delicious pareve desserts. For weddings and other simchahs, Gladstone's will also work with outside kosher bakeries to bring in one-of-a-kind cakes and other baked goods.

Whatever your event, there's always a dedicated staff person and a team "to make sure that all your needs are being met." Whether you're expecting 30 people or 350, Gladstone's takes your function seriously.

"With a lot of halls, you have basically your standard packages." That's why Falcitelli's willing to work hard to prove that, kosher or not, Gladstone's is "not just a typical hall."

Kosher caterers keep up with the times

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Two of Toronto's well-established kosher caterers, Ely's Fine Foods and Caterers York, have been able to successfully serve the community for many years by focusing on freshness, keeping up with the times and paying careful attention to the needs of their clients.

Ely's Fine Foods (416-782-3231; www.elysfinefoods.com) is a take-out business, privately owned by a husband-and-wife team. In their 13 years of business, they have maintained personal, one-on-one relationships with their clients, says one of the two owners, Perla Azulay.

Caterers York is the exclusive caterer at Adath Israel Congregation .

While Ely's will cater at a number of venues, much of their work is done in clients' homes. They do a lot of bar and bat mitzvahs and corporate wine and cheese parties. At the same time, they are versatile, and have worked in venues ranging from cruise ships to discos.

Ely's Fine Foods

☑ Kosher
☐ Non-Kosher

Azulay says Ely's pays close attention to choosing ingredients that are high-quality and treating those ingredients right. They use only lean meat, and the best quality meats, fish and poultry.

To get the best, Ely's will import what they need. For example, they bring in their ribs from Montreal.

The menus offer standard favourites like knishes, as well as inventive vegetable dishes such as fresh mango salad and squash kugel. All Ely's foods and dishes are fresh. No additives or preservatives are used in their kitchen.

"Also, we don't refreeze or reheat. Your cooked food comes to your premises steaming hot," Azulay says.

This commitment to freshness influences the way Ely's organizes its logistics. In preparing food, they allow time for cooking and delivering, but nothing is left sitting around.

Azulay observes that no two clients are exactly alike, and Ely's will customize a menu for you. With everyone vying for business, she says, the party industry has made clients more demanding.

Ely's has contacts to help you find things like flowers, linen or centrepieces, though they don't supply these things themselves.

Caterers York

☑ Kosher
☐ Non-Kosher

Caterers York (416-783-4293) has been in business for 52 years. Sharon Firestone co-owns the company with Euclides ("Bill") Batista. Firestone also owns a bakery that is a separate business, Sweet York Desserts (www.sweetyork.com).

Caterers York is the exclusive caterer at Adath Israel Congregation and will be exclusive at Beth David Synagogue as of Aug. 1. At Beth Tikvah, it is one of four caterers. It also caters off-site, and has worked at events of from 10 guests up to 1,000.

How has Caterers York stayed in business so long? It has kept up with trends in cuisine and service, always been ready to try something new. Firestone says they maintain consistent, predictable high quality in food and service.

In addition, Firestone is always ready to work with the client. "You can bring in a recipe of your own if you want," she says.

When Caterers York caters, she says, one of the two co-owners is almost always on site – "hands on, from beginning to end." For this reason, she doesn't over-book.

Firestone says good staff is vital to the company's success. Some of Caterers York's staff have been with the company for 10 or 15 years.

Asked when one should book a caterer, Firestone replies: "Three to six months is safe, but our on-site bookings, of course, come through the shuls. And some of these are as far ahead as 2010."

Shop the market for designer clothing

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Stores come and go, but some Toronto landmarks are here to stay. One such landmark is Tom's Place (416 596-0297), located at 191 Baldwin St. in the heart of Kensington Market.

Now in its 49th year, Tom's Place sells high-end men and women's clothing at affordable prices.

Opened in 1958 by owner Tom Mihalik's father as a used clothing store, Tom's Place has since gained a reputation in the city for being the source for fashionable, yet inexpensive, clothing.

Staying true to his father's philosophy, Mihalik insists on dressing men and women as chicly as he can for the lowest possible prices.

"If you like to wheel and deal, come to Tom's Place, where no price is ever truly firm and the customer reigns supreme," states the store's website. "We always believed in suits, and making people look great."

Tom's Place does indeed believe in suits. It carries more than 10,000 in a variety of sizes, which can be altered at the tailor shop on the premises.

"We always say, if you don't find a suit at Tom's Place, you aren't looking for a suit," laughs Mihalik.

This year, Tom's Place has expanded its selection of shirts and ties.

Among other important trends for the season, Mihalik cites a slim-fitting pant with a two-buttoned suit jacket.

In womenswear, Tom's Place carries only the best in designer labels, including Michael Kors and Hucke.

While the store's location might strike some as strange, the market only adds to the vibrancy of Tom's Place, as well as to the clothes inside.

"We stay here because we truly love the market," Mihalik says. "Kensington isn't just where do our business. It's our home as well."

"He used to love coming here because he knew it was the best value," Mihalik says.

For more information about Tom's Place, visit www.toms-place.com.

Plan ahead for great memories

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

More important than the food, music and décor of your simchah are the memories created during the event. And in order to capture them effectively, you need to make sure you have a stellar photographer.

"Event photographers have to be quick on their feet, and understand the situation. They are very reactive and can think ahead one or two steps, always anticipating what's going to happen next," said photographer Jordan Prussky, who has been shooting professionally for seven years.

"Quality, professionalism and reliability – I'm keen on those three aims," he said.

Prussky said you must always check out a photographer's work and see if you like it before hiring them. Liking the photographer helps too.

"In the end, the work speaks for itself. But you have to meet the photographer...the relationship between the photographer and client has to be solid, and built on trust and understanding," Prussky said.

"We want somebody that's going to understand where you're coming from, understand where your stresses are, and be able to deal with you as a human being first," said photographer David Amoils who has been shooting for 22 years.

He specializes in photographing children. Amoil's Kidzpics program captures the growth of a child by shooting them every six months for five years.

He said that the skills he needs for working with children, like empathy, patience, non-verbal communication and putting people at ease, translate well into his work with adults.

"People get overwhelmed by the magnitude of what they're walking into," said Amoils of the stress that events can bring. Part of the photographer's job is to minimize that stress.

"I've never been interested in capturing a smile. I'm interested in capturing the person," said Amoils of his photographic style.

Prussky described his style as "artistic contemporary," but said that he is flexible and trained in all styles.

"I go into every job as an empty canvas," Prussky said.

He also goes into every job energized. "I put 100 per cent of my ability and creativeness into it," he said.

"I tend to feed off my clients in getting to know them and understand them. I try to bring what I see or what I want, but I definitely feed off what they want and what they see, and try to come up with something that is unique for both of us."

Both photographers stress the importance of quick turnaround time in getting photos to their clients, and recommend booking well in advance. Prussky suggested booking six months ahead for bar and bat mitzvahs, and a year out for weddings. But the two photographers said that they are happy to take last minute jobs if they are available.

"I'm quite willing to take small jobs for an hour or two hours," said Amoils. "Even if it's on a Saturday night in the middle of June, I'm happy to do that."

To contact either photographer or have a look at their work, visit www.jordanprussky.com or call 416-420-1651, or www.davidamoils.com or call 905-882-6770.

The Granite Club can add style to your simchah

By DEBORAH STERESCU
Special to The CJN

If you're looking to throw a party and you're not restricted to a kosher menu, the Granite Club is a wonderful venue for any occasion.

If you're searching for style, the Granite Club (416-510-6676) has it. The club, which began in 1875 as a curling club but is now a prestigious athletic and social club, offers a large selection of different foods.

It can accommodate almost any dietary request, with a menu that can include Chilean sea bass, salmon wrapped in phyllo pastry, various hors d'oeuvres and sweet potato fries, to name but a few choices.

Some features of its menu for children include a "mocktail" bar, a candy station, a chip bar with several layers of chips and dip, and a sundae bar.

The Granite Club will customize its menu according to its customers' needs. For example, the kitchen can present special desserts based on the wishes of the client.

The club's grand ballroom fits 120 people comfortably, while its main ballroom fits 400 and features an enormous built-in stage, an attached patio for outdoor pleasures, and 12 beautiful chandeliers.

There are also several other rooms available, meaning the club can accommodate almost any occasion, lavish or casual.

The professional staff at the Granite Club will ensure that your event gets the full attention it deserves.

Catering director Deborah Muise believes that the Granite Club is a "unique venue" because it's like an extension of your home.

The club is decorated with beautiful artwork, sofas, chairs and a fireplace, which creates a warmth that also extends to the club's service, she says.

All this might explain why there is a growing demand for the Granite Club among people celebrating bar and bat mitzvahs and Jewish weddings.

For any special day, you want everything to be just right, and the Granite Club understands this, she says, so everything can be customized, from dessert to sound equipment.

Even lighting can be tailored to your desires. The club's alcove lighting has 40 different colours to choose from, so that it can be co-ordinated with the theme of any event.

Despite its cachet, the Granite Club is competitively priced, but it requires a year in advance for booking, Muise says.

For more information, an online menu and a virtual tour of the ballrooms, as well as splendid views of the club, visit www.graniteclub.com.

Try the Hard Rock life

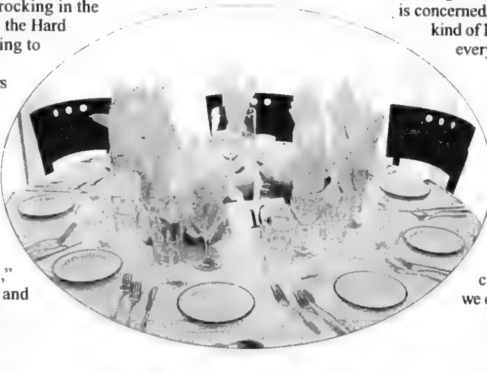
By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Neil Young was on the ball when he told us to "keep on rocking in the free world," and the Hard Rock Café is just sticking to the beat.

Over the last two years they have expanded their niche to become a popular destination for bar and bat mitzvahs, because kids can appreciate the décor, music memorabilia and great food too.

"Music has no age," said director of sales and marketing Robert Barbieri. "We have everything on our walls, from stuff from the early 50s and 60s to today's biggest artists."



Hard-Rock Cafe is like a one-stop shop that does everything for you.

Barbieri lists two great reasons for choosing the Hard Rock Café (416-362-3636) at Yonge and Dundas for your simchah: the venue itself and the lengths the staff take to meet each client's needs.

"It's legendary. We've been around for 36 years. We've got an amazing venue. As far as the decoration is concerned, it's already decorated. It's kind of like a one-stop-shop, we do everything for you" he said.

- ☐ Fully Kosher Facility
- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☐ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☑ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☑ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

"We're not a cookie-cutter kind of location, and we create every event based on our client's needs," Barbieri said. "We have an amazing banquet chef and we're not dictating that 'this is the menu and that's all we can do.' If the client has any ideas we can create it for them."

He said that bat and bat mitzvah menus usually have two types of food. There are the traditional children's' favourites such as pizza and onion rings, and a wide range of adult-pleasing selections, including chicken, beef and pasta.

If you want to host a kosher event, you can hire your own caterer, as long as they have a catering license, Barbieri said.

Besides the downstairs restaurant area, the Hard Rock Café also has an upstairs floor that can seat 200 people or hold almost 400 people reception style. Together, the two floors can accommodate up to 500 guests.

The venue's flexibility is also impressive. One or both floors can be rented, and clients have used the bottom floor as an arrival and reception area and the top floor for dancing, as it has more of a club feel, said Barbieri.

In-house music piping allows you to hold an event on one floor that simultaneously mirrors the one on the other, he said.

"Truly, it's all about the client."

While the Yonge and Dundas Hard Rock Café has not yet hosted a wedding reception, Barbieri said it is a possibility, and that different locations have done so. The other events the Yonge and Dundas hotspot typically host include holiday parties, corporate events and product launches. choosing the Hard Rock Café as a simchah venue is an easy decision.. "We're almost like a rock and roll museum. We've got great food, and a great atmosphere," Barbieri said.

No party is complete without the food

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

Specialty foods are always a hit with party guests.

While there are many types available, party sandwiches continue to please everyone.

Ask your friends, says Lesley Byrne, founder of Lesley's Party Sandwiches.

"This is a word of mouth business," says Byrne, noting that for 18 years, the company has been serving up sandwiches, fruit trays and much more.

"The most important thing [for clients] is to choose a [vendor] with a known name."

While the standards of egg, tuna, and lox and cream cheese still reign supreme in party sandwich circles, Byrne says some of the newer trends include vegetable wraps and mixed sandwiches, like a salmon, tuna and egg combo, with an olive to neatly and tastefully cap it.

"Party sandwiches go down well with everything, but they have to be fresh," she says.

"Ours are always fresh and we customize [them] to what clients want."

Those looking for a fancy fruit alternative can turn to Edible Arrangements which blends together scrumptious arrays of such fruits as honeydews, cantaloupes, grapes and strawberries, and arranges them in a bouquet. These function as a delicious dessert, and if you wish, a centrepiece too.

"It's a lovely centrepiece, and some people don't know whether to eat it or just look at it," says Nadeem Hassen of Edible Arrangements.

Hassen says the most popular arrangements today are the ones that combine the greatest variety of fruits.

☐ Kosher
☑ Non-Kosher

And for the sweet tooths out there, fruits dipped in chocolate are also a hit.

"We have a new feature of dipping bananas in dark and white chocolate, and that has been very popular," he says.

"Customers are welcome to be involved in the bouquet in order to create what they want in it."

When selecting fruit arrangements, Hassen advises to make sure the provider prepares them fresh daily, and that they do not add preservatives or sugar.

"The quality of food should speak for itself," he relates.

Also, do some taste testing of party sandwiches, fruits and any other specialty food before you sign up a vendor.

"When customers walk into the store, we give them free samples to get a real feel of the different edibles," Hassen says.

To contact Lesley's Party Sandwiches, call 905-660-0551 or visit www.lesleyspartysandwiches.com.

Klezmer can add flair to your simchah

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

If you are in the market for some live music at your next simchah, consider trying a versatile klezmer band that can play both traditional and modern tunes.

"Klezmer brings an authenticity, and reconnects us to the music that our Ashkenazi forbearers created and celebrated for centuries," said Jordan Klapman of Klapman's Klezmer Band (416-588-0854).

Klapman, who has been playing Yiddish music for 20 years, says it is important to think about your event specifics in order to select an appropriate band.

"[The band should be] interesting and varied," said Klapman. "[It] also needs to be very responsive to what happens, and be willing to adapt on a dime and change [its] program."

Klapman's Klezmer Band, he said, does just that.

"We're the only band in town that plays authentic klezmer music, and we are also good at playing a wide variety of other kinds of pop music without being a rock band," Klapman said.

He described what he offers as a "full-service simchah band." This means the band can adapt to what is needed at the reception, cocktail hour, dinner, dance, and any other time.

In the course of one evening, this adaptation can include a switch in the number of band members.

For a ceremony, Klapman's Klezmer Band can be as small as a duo, which would include Klapman on the keyboard and another musician switching between flute and clarinet. The band can grow to seven or eight members for a larger sound.

Klapman also plays keyboard for the Yiddish Swingtet (416-651-7521), another versatile band that mixes klezmer with classic swing.

"We try and make music that suits the mood and fits the right mood," said Jonno Lightstone, the band's clarinet, saxophone and flute player.

"Klezmer provides the freilech kind of sound that people like to dance to, the feeling of a joyous Jewish occasion. Swing is the music that set the mood for dancing or background music," Lightstone said.

"We bring an intimate sound that is very heartfelt."

Jordan Klapman

In addition to Lightstone and Kaplan, the trio also includes Tony Quarrington on guitar and mandolin. Lightstone says the Yiddish Swingtet can also add a singer, or drums and bass if the client wants more of a dance band.

"We play swing because klezmer is not always what's required," Lightstone said. "We try to be as versatile as we can."

Kaplan added that in the last few years, he has received fewer calls for strictly klezmer events.

"People want more world music," he said.

Whether you are looking for a dash of the traditional or a full evening of klezmer, the Yiddish Swingtet and Klapman's Klezmer Band can suit your individualized needs.

Baycrest, Hilton Suites offer finest in kosher catering

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

When it comes to kosher catering, people consider Baycrest to be "one of the best kept secrets in the community," says Sharon Bizouati, manager of Baycrest Terrace food and nutrition services and manager of Baycrest Hospitality Services (416-785-2500, ext. 2477).

She notes that some 15 years ago, the catering service was introduced to generate revenue for the world-renowned geriatric centre, located at 3560 Bathurst St.

"One of the nice things about our service is that when you cater with us, the money stays at Baycrest Centre."

Baycrest Centre

- ☑ Fully Kosher Facility
- ☐ Separate Kosher Kitchen Available
- ☐ Kosher Event Catering Available
- ☐ Capacity up to 100 People
- ☐ 100-300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Over 300 Person Capacity
- ☑ Wheelchair Accessible

Bizouati, who has been working in Baycrest food services for 32 years, was asked to develop a catering package. In addition to her nutrition science degree, she now has a certificate in event planning and management from George Washington University.

The service started when someone wanted to rent Baycrest facilities for a wedding, she recalls.

"It has grown into a full-fledged hospitality service. We have our own staff. Without the support of my dedicated staff, the events would not be as successful as they are."

She notes that offering this service made good business sense. "We were often able to use the Baycrest facilities to hold events. We have the capability of catering events for up to 500 people."

With up to 500 functions taking place each year, Bizouati advises people to plan ahead.

Baycrest offers excellent venues for conferences, weddings, hennas, and bar and bat mitzvahs, family reunions, Passover seders, donor events and birthday parties, says Bizouati, adding that Baycrest does outside catering and is one of the designated kosher caterers for the Toronto Centre for the Performing Arts.

"We just catered the post-concert dessert reception for 500 for Aid to Disabled Veterans of Israel [Beit Halochem Canada] at the Toronto centre for the Performing Arts."

She says prices for catering at Baycrest are competitive and the menus are customized.

"I meet with the clients to plan the menu. Everyone is different.

Stations are also very popular, she says. "A lot of people love our stations. Our smoked brisket is the best in the city. We have people call us to find out where we buy it."

Baycrest Hospitality provides one-stop shopping, she says.

"We offer referral to florists, entertainment services and other resources in the community," Bizouati says.

"Once we do an event, we maintain a relationship with our clients. We get a lot of repeat business and a lot of referrals.

For a truly elegant affair, there's nothing comparable to a hotel, according to Siena Pang, director of catering and conference services at the Hilton Suites Hotel (905-470-8500) in Markham.

A hotel is a prestigious venue with the Hilton Suites offering both elegance and very attentive service, she says.

The Hilton Suites, located at the south west corner of Warden and Highway 7, offers kosher catering.

"The kosher caterer comes in to make the kitchen is kosher a day before the event," she explains.

If the space is not available the day before, the kashering is done the morning of the simchah, she adds.

Generally, food for bar and bat mitzvah parties tends to be Jewish style, while the market for kosher food tends to be for weddings, she notes.

"We can accommodate people's kosher caterer, or we can recommend the caterers we have worked with. We know their standards, because we have worked with them. The mashgiach is on-site to supervise."

She says that clients work directly with the caterer to arrange the menu, and the hotel charges a facility fee to cover the room rental, servers and standard hotel linen. Plates must be rented separately, and clients are charged on a consumption basis for alcohol.

Most of the larger events take place in the Hilton Suite's conference centre, a free-standing structure connected to the hotel, Pang says.

"We have different size rooms. The rooms most commonly used for large parties are in the conference centre. Everything is done under one roof. The ceremony, cocktails and the reception."

The conference centre banquet hall can accommodate up to 800 people for dinner and dancing, while corporate events can be for a group as large as 1,000 people.

The 14,000-square-foot ballroom is very elegant, Pang says. "It has chandeliers and 20-foot high ceilings," she notes.

The hotel offers smaller size banquet rooms for parties of 200 to 250 people and smaller.

The cocktail reception is often held in the conference centre's elegant foyer, which has floor-to-ceiling windows, she says.

"They don't have to worry about transportation," says Pang.

"We can also arrange special banquets like welcome and rehearsal dinners and the send-off breakfast or brunch. We can customize any meal."

She adds: "The Hilton Suites offers convenience. Everything can be done in one place. You can house guests here, hold the ceremony here and the celebratory meals. Everything can be done under one roof in the most elegant surroundings."

Other kosher venues advertising in this supplement are Beth Tikvah Synagogue; Copper Creek Golf Club; Toscana Banquet & Conference Centre and Hilton Garden Inn, Toronto/Vaughan; Four Seasons Hotel; Gladstone's Wine Bar & Grill; King Solomon's Table; Park Hyatt Toronto; The Royal Banquet & Convention Centre, Bellvue Manor.

PARTY PLANNER

Party it up with arcades and NASCAR racing

Dave and Buster's (905-760-7600), a large restaurant and entertainment facility in Concord, is a popular venue for bar and bat mitzvahs, birthday and sports team parties, and an ideal setting for corporate meetings, team building and company banquets, says special events sales manager Mary Patrick.

The big attraction for both kids and adults is the extensive video arcade with more than 100 games and simulators, says Patrick. "Everyone has such a great time. We get lot of repeat business, especially from families who hold bar and bat mitzvahs here. They say it's the most fun they've had."

Dave and Buster's (www.daveandbusters.com), which is located at 120 Interchange Way in Concord, at the southeast corner of highways 400 and 7, is open every day of the year. The 65,000-square-foot facility can accommodate up to 2,500 people or hold several private events simultaneously, says Patrick. "For a party of 2,500 we'll close the building to walk-in guests."

She explains that children under 19, whether they're with family or attending a party, can play the games until 10 p.m. on weekends; after that time – it's an hour earlier on week nights– Dave & Buster's becomes a bar so minors must leave the premises or go into one of the self-contained party rooms.

The Show Room is one of the most popular party rooms for bar and bat mitzvahs, says Patrick. "It has a private bar and washroom and full audio capabilities. It can accommodate 170 people for dining and dancing or 300 people theatre style."

The restaurant also provides its own security, she adds. "We can even have the ceremony here in a separate room."

She says families can book their own disc jockey, or Dave and Buster's can make the entertainment arrangements, which can also include such novelty items as chocolate fountains and ice cream carts.

She says meals are generally kosher style. "We respect the tradition. We can serve fish and make arrangements for strictly kosher meals to be brought in."

People generally purchase a meal and the power card package for parties, she explains.

The restaurant also offers birthday package for children 12 and under with meals starting at $5.99; parents purchase power cards, usually in the $10 to $20 range.

People have the choice of holding the party in a more public space or renting a private room for $25 per hour, which can accommodate up to 32 people. The fee includes the use of the billiard tables and shuffle boards in that area, says Patrick.

Hockey and other sport teams packages are also available, she says, noting that the restaurant's policy for all parties with minors is to have a four to one, child to adult ratio.

Patrick says the parties are so successful that Dave and Buster's gets a lot of referrals as well as repeat clients for the bar or bat mitzvahs of other children in the same family.

NASCAR racing at the Vaughan Mills Mall.

"It's such an honour for me when they call to book the next child's party. It's the biggest compliment we get paid."

For the ultimate bar or bat mitzvah or kids' party, why not consider an indoor amusement park? NASCAR (National Association for Stock Car Auto Racing) SpeedPark (905-669-7370) at the Vaughan Mills Mall at Highway 400 and Rutherford Road, is the first Canadian location for this American-based race-themed attraction.

NASCAR SpeedPark, a 60,000- square-foot playground with indoor and outdoor go-cart tracks, also offers such activities as silicon motor speedway simulators, an interactive arcade with more than 70 games, slot car racing and laser tag, says Domenic Buttiglieri, general manager of NASCAR SpeedPark in Vaughan Mills.

"We are NASCAR's official family fun park. We have something for every age group."

Pamper yourself with spa and salon treatments

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

A lady simply cannot get through the daily grind without a few of life's little pleasures. One such pleasure most certainly is the salon and spa. In an environment where pampering and primping is the norm, all the stress and cares of the day disappear.

Located at 270 The Kingsway in the Humbertown Shopping Centre, the full-service upscale salon offers every imaginable esthetic service from hairstyling and waxing to manicures and pedicures, as well as all hair services.

In its fifth year, Cattiva is the second endeavour of Ernie Viggiani and Al DiMarco, who previously owned Capelli Salon in Bayview Village. "We have been working in the hairdressing and salon industry together for years," says Viggiani.

At Cattiva, the staff is extremely knowledgeable and welcoming. "We are by no means quiet," says Viggiani, laughing. "Our staff is known for being very warm."

The salon offers special consultations with clients. A consultation will ensure that the look you want is the one you walk out the door with for weddings, bar/bat mitzvahs or other simchahs. Special packages for bridal or simchah parties are available.

For a bit of a different kind of retreat, head to Uptown Spa (416-449-4044; www.uptownspa.com). Located at 801 York Mills Rd., Suite 311, at Leslie Street, Uptown has been offering a wide array of specialized spa services for the past 12 years. A complete day spa, Uptown offers everything from massage and botox injections to laser hair removal. The spa also offers manicures, pedicures, facials and hair services, among other esthetic services.

The 6,500-square-foot facility includes a hair salon and several massage and treatment rooms, as well as spacious lounges – both public and private.

And if throwing a spa party is what suits your fancy, Uptown will prepare the lounges with anything you have brought, from wine and desserts to snacks. "We'll even serve you wine while you get your nails done." says owner Anne Sorenson.

Among the spa's services, Sorenson cites the "double-peeling" facial as one of the most innovative and popular. By providing a deeper exfoliation, the double-peeling facial completely smooths and freshens the face. As well, Uptown carries high-quality skin-care products from Guinot, Sothys and other companies. Gift certificates are available as well.

Owned and operated by Sorenson, Uptown Spa maintains a comfortable and laid-back atmosphere while offering premier service. A staff of 40 are there to cater to your every need. They have been with the spa for years, and all of them have great relationships with their clients.

"What our clients repeatedly comment on is that we are just so nice," Sorenson says. "Our clients really love it here."

Whether you are preparing for a special event or are simply in desperate need of some "me" time, spending the day at either Cattiva or Uptown Spa will help lighten your load.

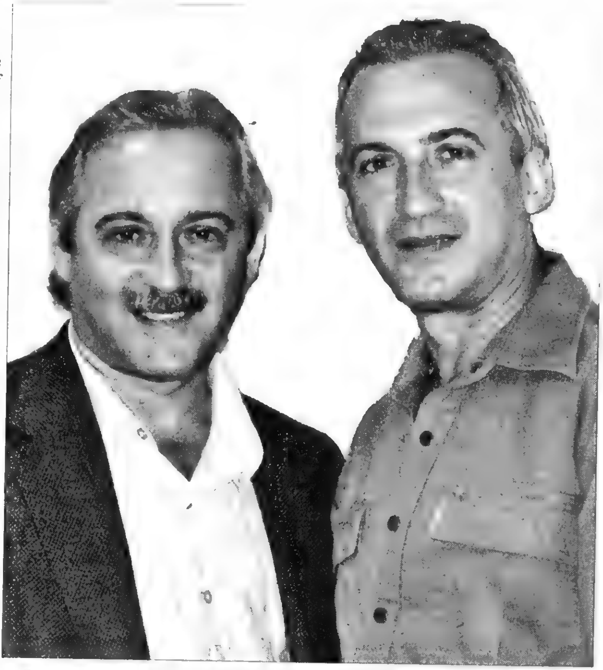
Not a Task to Delay

By DEBORAH STERESCU
Special to The CJN



Paul Laszlo, left, and his brother Andrew Laszlo of Twins Photo & Video

A videographer is one of the most important features of any well-planned festivity.

After years have passed, the food and presents disappear, but the video remains to remind people of great times that were shared.

Videoproductions by Josh is run by Josh Israel, who has been in the business for 28 years. He prides himself on the fact that he does his own camera and editing work, which lends him "more control" when it comes to ensuring that the video is of a high quality.

Videoproductions specializes in family events, particularly bar/bat mitzvahs and weddings. The company has done more than 2,800 major family events, of which 95 per cent have involved the Jewish community in Toronto.

Israel uses high definition video, he says, which creates more natural colours, better clarity and sound. The super wide lens of his cameras brings "a totally amazing" image, making certain that the video is the most valuable service of any Jewish event.

He says he has covered seven different events for one family, spanning over three generations.

Twins Photo and Video, in keeping with the theme of family events, is run by two twin brothers from Budapest, Andrew and Paul Laszlo, who have been in the business since 1981.

They cover events in both photo and video, from bar mitzvahs to brit milah, using strictly high-end digital equipment (with three exceptional quality digital cameras).

They hook up the cameras to microphones, which Paul says, is "very important", as the result is perfect sound with no background noise.

The family-run aspect of the business is important to Paul and Andrew, as they feel that their personal touch goes a long way in relating to different families on their special occasions.

Paul says that his business is run from home so he does not have to charge customers for his rent of a studio.

Videoproductions has a comprehensive website, where a video and shopping guide can be found, offering customers tips on how to find the right videographer for them.

For Videoproductions by Josh, one must consider booking two years in advance for bar mitzvahs, and one year before a wedding. Twins Photo and Video service can be secured up to six months in advance for any simchah.

Today's cruises exceed expectations

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

"There is no better way to travel," says Sheldon Saul of North York Cruise Ship Centres (416-492-2789; www.northyork.cruiseshipcenters.ca). It's not an empty boast: cruises consistently earn the highest satisfaction ratings of any leisure vacations, he says. Whether for a family occasion, corporate event or just a private getaway, cruising has changed – for the better.

"Cruising used to be for the wealthy," Saul admits. But these days, starting at $299, with meals included, no "hidden" costs like car rentals, and no extra hassle of finding restaurants and other amenities in confusing foreign destinations, cruises are becoming more and more popular with ordinary families looking for a truly relaxing break.

Cruising is no longer just for the wealthy

Activities for every family member from the youngest to the oldest include supervised day camps, ice skating, lectures and wine-tastings, so a cruise can also mean a worry-free break all the generations will enjoy.

"Grandparents are celebrating their 50th anniversaries with their families on cruise ships," says Saul, renewing their vows in the ships' chapels.

Nicole Bursey, the company's sales manager, says that "if somebody is looking to celebrate a special occasion, instead of partying at home where it's one night of memories, they'll spend two weeks in the Mediterranean and have a lifetime of memories from it."

Families often book six, seven or even eight cabins together to travel at times when they're all free, like winter vacation or March break. "You unpack once," Saul says, then "wake up every morning and you could be in a different part of the world."

The ships themselves have also changed, becoming airier and more spacious. "People were always afraid… they were going to be confined," Saul says. Newer ships are building up to 90 per cent of their outside staterooms with private verandas, so there's plenty of fresh air and privacy. "You'd be hard-pressed to find a hotel resort nicer than the cruise ships they're building today."

And today's destinations are new, too. "Wherever there's water, there's a cruise ship." Cruises can last anywhere from three days to 300 days, stopping in at the Galapagos Islands, Australia, Europe or Beijing. "World cruises are very popular," lasting anywhere from three weeks to six months, says Saul. "They're the first to sell out."

North York Cruise Ship Centres specializes in family and group travel, and also offers hosted tours, meaning you're not just getting on a cruise and going by yourself. Themed tours accompanied by a consultant from the travel agency tie the whole experience together into a meaningful package.

A Jewish Heritage cruise of the Mediterranean is already almost full for September 2008. With stops in Israel, Egypt, Greece and Turkey, the cruise includes private excursions as well as special pre- and post-cruise hotel accommodations. Everything's planned in advance for a seamless vacation, and many clients eagerly sign up for their next hosted cruise as soon as they get home. "We did one with 60 people to Asia… in July, we're going to Scandinavia with many of the same people."

Although it's easy to find cruise "deals" on the Internet, Saul says that booking through a travel agency, you'll get more than just a ticket. "We're all humans. Things happen on vacation… we pride ourselves in making sure things get resolved." With North York Cruise Ship Centres, "there is someone there on their behalf."

Online, clients "may be able to save three to four per cent, but they're sacrificing service." And Bursey points out that even those great deals may not be such a bargain. "You're often getting what nobody else would buy."

An agency also lets you plan around special needs, like family and group bookings, which are difficult or impossible to organize alone on the Internet. "We offer family cruises for bar mitzvahs, weddings, anniversaries, honeymoons and family reunions" Saul says. For parties from four to 400, with special service for incentives and corporate events, they'll make sure your group gets just the right cruise experience.

As a cruise specialist, North York Cruise Ship Centres is in a unique position among travel agencies, says Bursey. "Because we sell so many, every single day, we're very up to date in what's happening with a cruise line or one particular ship, much more so than an agency that sells one cruise every two months."

Cruises for bar mitzvahs, weddings and honeymoons

A franchise of a larger international company, the company has built its business on strong relationships, not only with clients but also with all major cruise lines, including Royal Caribbean, Celebrity and Oceania. There's even a one-day sale –"our busiest day of the year," says Saul – coming up in June on Princess Cruises.

After 10 years in the cruise business, Saul sees his job as matching clients with the right cruise for their budget and needs. "Not every ship is for every person… there are hundreds of cruise ships – we put them on the ship that will exceed their expectations."

If you are looking for a truly unique entertainment option, you may wish to consider seeing eye to eye with a bantam chicken or watching your head on the big screen, bobbing along to Sir Mix-A-Lot's Baby Got Back.

Whimz and Dance Heads are two entertainers that are gaining popularity and guaranteed to make your event stand out.

One to three guests at a time can sing or bob along to a catchy song while their heads are superimposed on professional dancers' bodies and animated backgrounds.

When asked what type of event is perfect for Dance Heads, Daphne replied, "anywhere there are people, and people of all ages."

Dance Heads serves parties and gatherings for as few as 10 to as many 1,200 people, including corporate events. One-third of the Schuylers' business comes from bar and bat mitzvahs. Though they have not done weddings yet, Daphne said Dance Heads is ideal for the down time between the ceremony and the reception.

"We are great at bar mitzvahs because people book us for the kids, but it's the adults and parents that get in on it and have fun," Daphne said.

"The beauty of it is you don't need any talent," she said. Dance Heads uses the original singers' voices in their 21 songs and records no audio.

After the segment is recorded, the guests watch their masterpiece on a projected screen. At the end of the event, all guests receive a DVD of their performance and the host gets a master copy of the entire event.

"When they see the whole picture, that's when they really 'laugh till they cry,'" said Daphne, quoting the Dance Heads motto.

She added that you really have to watch the phenomenon to understand it.

Demos are available on the website at www.danceheads.com. Dance Heads Ontario can be reached at 1-866-366- 1983, and while Daphne has bookings into 2008, she suggests calling two weeks before your party. Dance Heads also has offices in Quebec and Western Canada.

For an even more unusual party experience, consider Whimz, a program that lets you see, interact with and learn about live animals.

Whimz can host a party at your home or hold it at the studio at St. Clair Avenue and Bathurst Street. Birthday parties can accommodate up to 25 children, and the birthday child helps choose up to eight animals for the party.

Whimz has about 65 unique creatures, including a hedgehog, chinchilla, bantam chicken, scorpion and ground squirrel.

"The snake always wins the popularity contest," says Whimz owner and founder Lynn Kaplan.

Talent isn't needed for Dance Heads events.

Kaplan, who founded the program 12 years ago, has a background working with both children and animals, as she worked at Jewish camps and led trips to Israel. While there, she took care of animals on a kibbutz.

Creating Whimz allowed her to combine these interests. The program now serves any type of event, including children's and adults' birthday parties, weddings and bar mitzvahs, Purim and Chanukah parties and large Shabbat dinners. Whimz also has a variety of camp, school and studio programs. In addition, it provides animal education in the community, including talking about Jewish ethics with regard to critter care.

"Of all the animal companies, we are the only one that offers parent and tot classes," Kaplan said. This studio program allows children as young as 18 months to get comfortable around fauna with their parents.

The animals are still a hit, even with more squeamish children, Kaplan says.

Whimz can be reached by calling 416-656-7894 or by visiting www.whimzonline.com.

Host or Guest: buy it all for less

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Whether you're planning a party or going to one, the big question is always how to find that distinctive, high quality touch for the best possible price.

Husband and wife team Chuck and Barbara Elnekave of The Israeli Source (905-482-2025; www.israelisource.com) have the answer: save money and support Israel, too.

The formula for savings is a simple one: cut the middleman."I try to buy as much as possible directly from Israel," says Chuck.

The Israeli Source offers a "big-box, active" shopping experience in its 4,000- square-foot Doncaster Avenue warehouse-style store. "We're definitely not a boutique, and our customers aren't paying a premium for pretty shelving units."

If you're planning a simchah, you'll want to stop by to check out The Israeli Source's prices and service on items such as personalized benchers or kippot.

For either item, there's a price range for any budget and personal style, from very basic to more elaborate keepsake items that guests will cherish for years.

They also offer chupah rentals and other essential items like tallitot, tefillin and kittels (white coat worn by grooms).

For guests puzzling over gift decisions, The Israeli Source offers a variety of fine books and Judaica in traditional or modern designs. No matter what the occasion, you'll probably find the perfect gift.

Starting at $30, around the same price as a box of chocolates, Shabbat, holiday or simchah guests can present their hosts with a distinctive gift basket in one of several styles.

There are also baby baskets that include clothing items or Jewish-themed toys like a plush sefer Torah.

Books make a great bar or bat mitzvah gift, and The Israeli Source offers many such as Haggadahs, books on Halachah, and sets of machzorim for the holidays; there are also beautiful coffee-table books. Anthologies and boxed sets make great gifts, and children's books are also available, both old favourites and new classics.

For a great wedding gift, they even carry today's hottest Shabbat-table item: kiddush fountains. Make the blessing, pour wine from the cup into the top of the fountain and it flows into up to a dozen matching small cups waiting beneath.

Standard kiddush cups are also available, along with unique and beautiful havdalah sets, challah boards and knives, menorahs and other Judaica gifts in almost every style.

Elnekave takes pride in the store's selection of today's finest Judaica artists: avant-garde coloured aluminum menorahs by Avi Sidler and textile art (challah covers, tallis bags and more) in silk and organza by Ronit Gur.

Apart from elaborate copper and fused-glass constructions in the well-known Gary Rosenthal collection, all featured artists are Israeli. "I'm there on sourcing trips about twice a year," says Elnekave, meeting with wholesalers and also "with some of the artists just to see what they have that's new."

Besides supporting the Israeli economy, Elnekave says it's pure economic sense. "Basically, every time [an item] passes through someone's hands, the product's going to end up costing more …we're trying to source it as directly as we can so the customer can end up saving money." He also buys large quantities wherever possible to increase the savings.

"People coming in here are just amazed by the prices," says Elnekave, and in the $1\frac{1}{2}$ years that the store has been open, customers have quickly become very loyal. "It's not something they're used to… seeing prices like this."

Copper Creek Golf Club makes affairs to remember

Copper Creek is a very unique setting.

By JENNA ROSMAN
Special to The CJN

For an elegant affair, where beauty and landscape is as important as the quality of the cuisine, Copper Creek Golf Club in Kleinburg will not disappoint, says Doug Collier, its director of food and beverages.

"It is a very unique setting. It is an oasis from the everyday. When you turn into the driveway, all of the landscape and the greens of the golf course itself and then all the landscaping surrounding the club house are really beautiful. It really takes you away from where you think you are," Collier says of Copper Creek (905-893-3370).

Just outside the 40,000-square-foot clubhouse venue sit several ponds, many with fountains, amid lush gardens that overlook the Humber River Valley.

"There are lots of features that you really would not find in a traditional banquet hall," he says.

The venue has two ballrooms, the smaller of which overlooks the golf course and can accommodate up to 120 people. The larger ballroom has a capacity of up to 500 people.

Ceremonies can take place indoors or outdoors on a stone terrace.

The venue is equipped with a fully supervised and full-service kosher kitchen. The menu for both the kosher and non-kosher functions has an Italian influence, says Collier.

However, each event is unique.

"We try to be creative and we customize the menu for each individual event," he says.

Copper Creek Golf Club's renowned executive chef, Gianpiero Tondina, has received many culinary awards, including the esteemed Escoffier Award for chef of the year in 2002. (Escoffier Award recipients are chosen by other such executive chefs throughout Ontario, Collier says.)

The kosher menu features an extensive choice of entrees, from slow-roasted, herb-crusted rack of lamb to Cornish hens stuffed with garlic mashed potato with red wine demi glaze, to citrus-crusted halibut with roasted red pepper salsa.

"We have a bridal suite that can be used throughout the day, and we also have a locker facility, so the bride and groom can spend their entire day here - they can shower, get ready and do their hair and make up here," he says.

For more information on Copper Creek, visit www.coppercreek.ca.

MINT produces events of exceptional imagination

MINT Lifestyle Events has officially arrived on the Canadian special events scene.

Canada's first-ever "boutique" entertainment service, MINT (www.mintevents.ca) offers a fresh, new approach in specialized event consultation, planning and production.

"It's almost a form of holistic entertainment," says MINT creative director Jeff Kahane. "We want to understand the people that we service, their lifestyles, hopes and dreams, in order to hone in on the optimum experience to excite the senses."

MINT is the brainchild of Jared Florence, Noah Cappe and Jordan Fogle. As the architects behind Mandell Xtreme, Superfly Entertainment and Lobby (Toronto's chic restaurant and lounge), these three have been at the front line of Toronto's event production community for more than two decades.

Now, along with veteran creative director Jeff Kahane of Eyecon Creative, Florence, Cappe and Fogle have combined their broad range of expertise in the private events arena to bring exceptional credibility, originality and a vibrant energy that will elevate the client experience to an exceptional level of service, quality and satisfaction.

Whether you're planning a large corporate function, a small private party, an arts festival or product launch, MINT will deliver unparalleled performance and ensure that your event is as exquisite as it is exclusive.

This entails anything from a quarter-million-dollar "branded" bar/bat mitzvah and a forthcoming Wonka-meets-Seuss extravaganza that will benefit entertainment programs for Sick Kids Hospital to an engagement party featuring Sir Elton John. MINT also offers a lifestyle component to their business, which includes the services of a fashion stylist, a spatial stylist, event branding and graphic design.

Unique to its model, MINT will also promote its own series of lifestyle events that will not only be geared to the obvious crowd of stimulation-seeking teens and young adults but for the first time will also reach out to older singles, young married couples and families in the hope of revitalizing physical human socialization as a backlash to the de-socialized computer dating, online shopping world to which we've all become accustomed.

The MINT mandate guarantees that it will produce events of exceptional imagination, energy, and style, within any budget – elevating the client experience and ensuring every celebration is as unique as the people behind it.

With cutting-edge creativity and keen insight into the latest trends in entertaining, MINT will cater to clients who truly demand the exceptional.

Party favours help preserve memories

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

In all of the excitement of a party, special moments often fly by quickly.

For example, Eventworks specializes in on-site digital photos, a novelty item that captures memories and is a fun hit with guests of all tastes and ages.

"If you're going to give something away, photos are something that everyone keeps," says Ariel Platt, co-owner of Eventworks.

Platt notes some people like to incorporate the photos with their party theme.

"In 2007, a lot of people have been into James Bond, so we've custom designed our borders to relate to that theme," Platt says.

"Some people may want the colour [theme] of the night in the photos, or for [the colour] to be consistent with the invitation. If it's specific or general, we can come up with it."

In addition to photos, Eventworks provides other novelty items, including t-shirts, key chains and magnets.

No matter what party favour you fancy, be sure to check out your vendor's past work.

"Go online to see samples," Platt advises.

"And you want to make sure that [the vendor] has the proper equipment and a lot of experience in producing a high quality product."

If you want to seek out the best party favour for your affair or have your event planner look after it, a one-stop party shop is a good place to visit.

In business for more than 10 years, the 6,000 sq.ft. store has a host of party favour products, from blow-up guitars, to flashy necklaces.

"If it's the party planner or the actual [party host], they can come in and we'll sit down with them to find out what they want within their budget," says Andy Sermer, manager of Tyme to Party.

When shopping around for party favours, Sermer says it's important to find a store that makes customer service a top priority.

"What differentiates stores is the service," Sermer says.

"For instance, we'll [serve] people as soon as they come in, and we will carry all the items they buy out to their cars."

If the party favour vendor is at your event, such as the case with Event Works, then customer service is also integral.

"It's not enough to just take a photo," Platt says.

Platt and Sermer agree that it's necessary to realistically gauge how many party favours you will need and to base this not only on the number of people at your affair, but on budget.

Party favour items and vendors get bought and booked quickly, so leave yourself a good six months in advance to arrange for them.

To learn more about Event Works, visit www.eventworks.ca or phone 416-482-3984.

Cayne's bridal registry has a full refund policy

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

For the bride and groom, selecting a place to register can be tricky. Cayne's The Super Housewares Store can provide all of a couple's domestic needs.

The store has been around for 21 years and features mid to high-end appliances that are built to last.

"But we sell [them] at everyday, ridiculously low prices and that's our reputation," said owner Jerry Cayne.

"There's no one that can touch us on that. In terms of quality and prices, we offer substantial savings," he said. Cayne noted that Cuisinart, Braun and Kitchen Aid are among the top-quality brands the store offers.

When a couple chooses to register at Cayne's The Super Housewares Store (905-764-1188; www.cayneshousewares.com), they come in, often with other family members, and meet with a consultant.

"We don't rush them. We try to offer them guidance as to what their basic needs are going to be, not what everyone else wants them to get, but what's best for them," Cayne said.

The pair receives a "bride bag" filled with goodies for both the bride and groom, said Cayne, including cookbooks and coupons.

He said the advantage to working and building a relationship with someone at the store is that the consultant will update the client as new products come into the store or as the client's needs change. Change is common, he said, when the couple registers more than a year before the wedding.

"We try to make it as stress-free as it can be," he said.

"It is a little stressful for a lot of brides. It's to their advantage to speak to someone here and get to know them."

An important thing to consider when choosing a place to register, Cayne said, is what happens when the couple receives a gift they don't want. Often, stores will only give a credit note for that gift, and the newlyweds will have a pile-up of potentially unusable slips. Cayne's The Super Housewares Store has a full refund policy for any gifts the bride and groom deem unfit.

Cayne also said that it is important for the twosome to consider the look of their "ultimate" home. His store's appliances are going to last a long time, he said, and shouldn't one day clash with something in the rest of the house.

Brushed stainless steel is currently a popular choice for appliances, for example, but Cayne said that if the bride and groom want an all-white kitchen one day, this may not be a good fit.

There is no magic time to register in advance of the big date, Cayne said, although he suggested at least a month before any type of party or shower is held.

Aside from appliances, Cayne's The Super Housewares Store also sells bed and bath products, cutlery, tablecloths, general gifts and a wide variety of kitchen and bakeware.

Look for experience when choosing an invitation maker

By JENNA ROSMAN
Special to The CJN

Invitations are the first glimpse a person will see into your affair.

Barbara Mortfield of Barbara Mortfield invitations and Gilda Lefton of Stationery Plus have both been in the business of making invitations for decades.

Mortfield (416-590-0515; e-mail cameoinvites@rogers.com) has 39 years of experience making invitations "I'm very reliable, helpful, and I give my opinion freely and people generally are very pleased to deal with me," she says.

Mortfield has created bar and bat mitzvah invitations for the children of couples for whom she created wedding invitations.

Tessa Alexandra Schiller

"It's generational," she says. "By and large [most of my business] has come from word of mouth [from previbus customers]."

Mortfield says the one thing that has changed significantly since she started, almost four decades earlier, has been the emergence of bar and bat mitzvah invitations in the Canadian market, around 20 years ago.

"[Before then] you had to use the invitations that people used for weddings, which were very bad and very fancy," she says.

"When I did my son's bar mitzvah, I had to use a wedding invitation. It was made of vellum and had a gold edge – it was horrible."

Eventually, due to pressure from Mortfield and others in the field, Canadian suppliers turned their attention to bar and bat mitzvah invitations.

According to Mortfield, the key to a beautiful invitation is in the type of paper used, which can include vellum, linen and Japanese paper.

Current wedding invitations are very "classic" and "have become a lot simpler," she says.

Speaking of earlier wedding invitations, which revolved heavily "on designs [featuring] orchids, flowers or candles," current invitations are "quite distinguished looking," she says. "They've become larger, too. We're using a lot larger-sized invitations than before."

Mortfield creates invitations to fit any budget and says that an invitation "can look expensive, but it doesn't have to be expensive."

Lefton (905-881-5588) has been making invitations as well as seating cards, kippot, wedding favours and seating card holders for close to 28 years.

She says the style of invitations and stationery is constantly evolving.

"As everything else, there are trends, there are things that are traditional that never go out of style, there are things that are contemporary and modern and there are things that do fade away and then come back again," she says.

Lefton says that in addition to the sizes and shapes of invitations, the style of the invitation has changed as well.

While overlays, she says, "still haven't had their day yet," traditional ribbons are still being used "not necessarily as bows, but as ribbon trim or a ribbon tie."

Lefton says that custom-made invitations aren't as expensive as people think.

"Custom only means that I arrange something special for that client. So we change something around from that book invitation. We do things that make them unique for that client, if that's what they want," she says.

Mortfield and Lefton both say that clients should look for experience when they are choosing a business to create that perfect invitation.

"Some people don't take much notice of the experience of the dealer until sometimes it's too late. Someone with experience… can cope with things that go wrong such as unexpected delays, unexpected manufacturing situations or changes in paper," Lefton says. "Someone inexperienced really comes up against a wall and can't really react as well."

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

The Fairmont Royal York has 78 years of experience and is still finding innovative ways to make your event memorable and unique.

The hotel's new wedding package, set to launch July 1, is tailored to the modern client's desire for options and flexibility.

"We're very excited about the launch of it," said conference services and catering director Fernando Teixeira.

The package, which can be customized for any large social event, focuses on choice.

The reception can have many different interactive stations, where chefs prepare food in front of guests. Drink options can be tailored as well, perfect for a bar or bat mitzvah, where there are more children.

As for desserts—"miniatures are now the thing," said Teixeira. "We're incorporating a dessert station that factors a lot of that into it, as well as more of a sweet and savoury aspect." He described options like grilled cheese sandwiches as becoming more popular late at night.

Fairmont's executive chef, David Garcelon, joined the hotel a year and a half ago, and since then the menu has been revised "from top to bottom," Garcelon said.

"One of the great things about the Royal York is we're one of the only hotels in the city, if not the only hotel, that has a full pastry shop with 15 people."

Because guests don't often see that caliber of pastry, Garcelon said, they want to sample as many different things as possible, which makes miniatures a great choice.

"Whenever possible we meet with the client," he said. "We really get to know what they want. A great number of our events don't come from the banquet menu or from the wedding packages—that's sort of a starting point…with the customer nowadays it's all about choice."

For large events, a chef's table is held in the kitchen, where event planners or the family can see the exact plates that will be served, discuss any changes they want and have photos taken so the end result is exactly what they pictured.

The ceiling at the Imperial Room is over 20 feet high.

The Royal York holds about 250 large events (for more than 100 people) annually. About half of those are "kosher-style." If clients want full kosher catering, the hotel refers them to GMB Culinary Productions, with whom they have worked for the past seven years.

"It's really quite seamless," said Teixeira of the process. The hotel has about 10 GMB-catered events a year, and more that require just a few kosher plates.

"We're cautious because although it's a kosher event, it is a representation of the hotel," he said. "We need to make sure we have a partner that we're comfortable with, that will represent us in the best light."

Beyond the kitchen, both Garcelon and Teixeira agreed that as a venue, the Fairmont Royal York is second to none.

"You've got the great ambience of the hotel and the presence of the hotel, the address, the stature—our ballrooms are rooms of castles, they're not function rooms," said Teixeira.

He described the Concert Hall and Imperial Room as the two most popular choices, each with ceilings over 20 feet high.

"The presence of this building, the fact that it's part of Toronto's landscape, we think—and people tell us—that there's still something to be said for having your event at the Fairmont," said Teixeira.

"We did over a millio[illegible] meals last year, but the most important events we do are the social events," said Garcelon. "They're so important to our status in this city and our position in this city, and we take that very seriously."

The Royal York boasts many different rooms, and is sure to have something to fit parties of any size. The hotel is so in-demand that Teixeira suggested booking a full year in advance. In special circumstances, he said, a two-year advance reservation can be made.

One-stop shops have a range of supplies for any party

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

From balloons to baskets, cutlery to candy, the following two shops have a range of party supplies to compliment any simchah.

After spending countless hours in the kitchen cleaning dishes after a Pesach meal, Mel Grevler figured there must be an easier way to entertain.

Grevler explored the disposable wares industry and in 1990, opened Party Supply Depot Ltd. (905-764-5457), located at 92 Doncaster Ave. in Thornhill, as an answer to his washing woes.

Seventeen years later, Grevler's store is home to an extensive range of products including napkins imported from Europe, an assortment of balloons and more than 32 colours of disposable drink and tableware.

"Some of our tableware is so good, people say they put it in their dishwasher," Grevler said.

From the cheapest paper plate to the more expensive microwavable plastic, Grevler said he does his best to ensure his store has a broad selection of products, with pricing that meets everyone's budget.

"We do our best not to forget the basics. That's what we built our business around," Grevler said.

Party Supply Depot is not just for adults. Kids are also encouraged to come in and create their own loot bags from the huge variety of goodies, he said.

"I've had kids come in when we first started who were four, five and six-years-old and now they are bringing their own children in," he said.

"We're not just a party stop, we're a place to stop and chat to friends," Grevler added.

Elaine Levison of Geri's Eatin' Centre (416-445-5504), also has loyal customers returning to her store year after year.

"We've had the same customers coming to us for 29 years," said Levison about her family-run business at 1875 Leslie St. Unit #5, in North York.

Levison's sister established the health food bulk store in 1979. Six years later, Levison and her daughter, Randi Basian, purchased the store and branched out into bulk giftware.

Geri's Eatin'Centre creates gift baskets and trays for all occasions including birthdays, anniversaries, baby showers, weddings and corporate events.

Their baskets vary from the Party Basket with salsa, tortillas, chocolates, cookies and gourmet cocoa, to their Corporate Classic basket containing chocolate truffles, roasted nuts, pasta, herbed oil, antipasto and crackers. Modifications can be made to all baskets to accommodate kosher, low fat and diabetic diets.

Levison and Basian are constantly in search of suppliers who can provide them with unique items to include in their baskets and trays.

"We can't have everything original, but we try to source out original things that are not outrageous in price," said Levison.

Geri's Eatin' Centre was the first store in Toronto to carry Miss Vickie's potato chips. But, there is one item in particular that has customers coming back for more: their No. 1 selling item – Crunch candy.

"Everyone who gets it comes back for it. There isn't one person who has tried it and didn't say 'wow'," said Levison.

For more information on Geri's Eatin' Centre visit: www.torontobaskets.com.

The Mini-Motor Speedway is NASCAR's "premier track offering," he says of the 746-foot oval road course featuring scaled-down Nextel Cup style cars. He describes a second outdoor track called SlideWayz as " slick and tough with a highly polished surface."

The third outdoor track, the Family 500, is a 606-foot-road course featuring single and double seater cars; the driver of a single seat vehicle must be a minimum of 52 inches, says Buttiglieri. "If you're over 40 inches you can go as a passenger. We're all about family fun."

Indoors, The Qualifier provides a 56-foot-starter track for younger car drivers, he explains. "The junior track on the main level is for children 40 to 54 inches tall, while The Champion's Track, an indoor-elevated, figure-eight track, is for adults and children who are a minimum of 54 inches."

Buttiglieri notes that there are also rides for children 36 inches and taller – a carousel, Pro-Tow and Junior Speedway.

He points out that there are a variety of ticket options for guests. Walk-in customers can purchase the park's wristband for $30, allowing them unlimited participation in all the racetracks and attractions, with the exception of the Mini-Motor Speedway and the NASCAR Silicon Motor Speedway simulators. Individual tickets, ticket packages and group packages are also available.

Birthday parties for 11 children start at $349, he says. The price includes lunch, unlimited rides, a roll of tokens for the arcade and the use of a private party room for 1½ hours.

The restaurant offers grilled items like hamburgers and hot dogs as well as pastas and pizzas, says Buttiglieri. "We can [bring in food for] a kosher party.

"We cater to all groups of all sizes, whether it's a birthday party or corporate event," he says. "We have four party-room facilities. Each room exceeds 500 square feet. We can do parties for 300 people. We can tent the outside area. We're very flexible."

The Pickle Barrel offers all-inclusive party packages

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

It's impossible to resist the Pickle Barrel's delicious party sandwiches, and that's one of the reasons why the restaurant's catering sector has become so popular with Torontonians.

From backyard barbecues to bar mitzvahs, the Pickle Barrel (416-493-4333; www.picklebarrel.ca) is guaranteed to tickle your taste buds with its vast catering menu.

"Our events provide a friendly, warm and comfortable atmosphere," said Sheryl Ross, Pickle Barrel's events co-ordinator.

The franchise's banquet halls, located in the Markville Shopping Centre and in the Rose Room at its Leslie Street location, are ideal for large simchahs, including family brunches and engagement parties, and are tastefully decorated to reflect the mood of your event.

After undergoing a recent renovation, the Markville hall has a modern, contemporary feel, with cherry wood and brick walling, and hanging glass lighting with wood trim. "It's beautiful and classy," Ross said.

It's stressful organizing an affair on your own, which is why the Pickle Barrel has Ross to organize everything, including the entertainment, décor and menu, to make certain your occasion is a memorable success.

"I'm the party, events and banquet coordinator, and I'm there from the beginning of planning to the end of the function," she said. "The all-inclusive packaging we provide is very convenient because all your party necessities are available at one place, and everything comes together with ease."

Packages include china, tables and chairs, linens, flowers and centerpieces, serving staff, bartenders, tents and dance music.

Another crowd-pleaser is sautéed skewers of grilled beef, chicken and salmon with teriyaki or peanut dipping sauce.

"Personally, the brunch is the best meal Pickle Barrel Catering has to offer on its catering menu," said Ross. "It comes with an omelette station, a waffle bar, warm blintzes and French toast, bagels, a dairy platter with smoked salmon, a fruit platter, and sweets and cookies."

Throughout its 30 years of business, the Pickle Barrel has continued to impress patrons.

"We have the best venues and food for the best value," said Ross. "Everything PB catering provides its clients is consistent and incredible [and] at a great and affordable price point."

A gift of jewelry is a token of love

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

A gift of jewelry is a token of strong and lasting love.

Toronto jewellers Eileen Silberzweig of Eileen's Pearls (416-630-1463), and Lilliane Moses, of Lilliane's Fine Jewellery (416-920-7676; www.lrfjewels.com) have their own specialties in the world of jewelry and are pleased to share their knowledge if you're looking for a special gift.

Silberzweig specializes in pearls, restringing and restoring them, as you might expect from the name, but she also repairs all other kinds of jewellery. Working out of her home, she started the business 30 years ago, and is a member of the Canadian Jewellers Association.

There are freshwater and natural (or ocean) pearls. The freshwater are smaller than the ocean variety.

Pearls have been held in high value as far back as biblical times. In Canada, they are treasured gifts for brides, and for Mother's Day. They are also valued for anniversaries and birthdays.

Since cultured pearls are grown by oysters in nature, most have blemishes: spots, bumps or pits on the surface. The fewer blemishes, the more valuable the pearl. Those with none at all are rare.

It is also rare to find a perfectly round pearl: the rounder, the more valuable. However, Baroque pearls, which are asymmetrical, appeal to some people because of their unusual shape, and often cost less than round cultured pearls.

Cultured pearls come in a wide range of colours – black, white, grey, silver, yellow and rose. While colour is a matter of preference, light-toned pearls tend to look best on those with fair skin, and creamy tones on those with darker complexions.

Cultured pearls are measured by their size in millimetres. All other factors being equal, the larger the pearl, the more valuable: it is hard for an oyster to grow a pearl more than five millimetres in size. The most popular size sold around the world is about seven millimetres.

Most of the biggest ones come from the South Seas or Australia. Mabe pearls can be as big as 30 millimetres.

Most of what leaves Moses' store is either customized or redesigned older jewelry – for example, an antique ring with a new, updated pattern. Her niche is custom design, with everything in the shop handmade, or a one-of-a-kind original.

A gemmologist is on the premises at all times; and Moses herself is a professional gemmologist. The staff are knowledgeable about current trends as well as materials.

Moses has been in her Hotel Intercontinental location for 18 years. Most of her business is repeat clientele, now into the second generation.

"We don't need to advertise," she says. "Word of mouth is our major form of advertising. We keep our expenses low for the sake of the consumer.

"A piece must not only be beautiful in its own right, in the showcase," says Moses. "It must also look good on the client."

Advanced PRODUCTS GROUP

Rental firms supply crucial party components

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

When it comes to planning a party, rental companies – such as linen and audio-visual equipment suppliers – have the products you need when you need them.

Debbi Farkas of Around the Table (416-630-6704, www.aroundthetable.ca) says her company specializes in high-end linen rental, mainly tablecloths and napkins. With close to 10 years in business, it's one of the leaders in its field.

Farkas does most of her buying in Europe, bringing a European flavour to the Canadian market.

She says this is fun for her as a buyer, and gives the company a competitive edge.

Europe's colours, she says, are three or four years ahead of North America's, and in general, Europe still leads in design.

"In any case," Farkas laughs, "I have to buy in Europe now. Clients expect me to have this edge. I can't change."

Around the Table offers a great variety of patterns and colours in napkins, tablecloths and overlays. And its website has special sections devoted to bridal and corporate linens.

Around the Table offers service as much as product. Today's linen selection is so huge, it can be overwhelming, so Farkas and her staff like to guide clients through the process of making a choice. They enjoy working with people.

She and her staff are also familiar with the venues in the city. They know what linen fits what size of table, and they can advise clients on what colours and designs work best in each hall according to its decor. In fact, she puts staff through a course in which they see all the major venues and learn what fits where.

Farkas checks with clients constantly to make sure the order is correct down to the smallest detail. This helps the event planner as well as the client. Likewise, it helps both client and event planner that she's always on time.

Farkas also mentions quality control. This can be painstaking: organza, for example, is always double-checked, because it's hard to find holes in it.

"I got so many rental requests, though, that I decided to open a rental business," he says.

Giant Screen Systems is now in its 24th year renting screens, projection and lighting systems, sound systems, and cameras. Seventy per cent of its rentals are based on large screen formats, and 30 per cent on sound systems. It carries up-to-date product lines, such as high-definition TVs and wired or wireless mikes.

Its clients are corporate and private, for parties and other events. Corporate and organizational functions are most common, but it also serves plenty of private events.

And the company can record your event for you.

Rental fees include technicians to set up and operate equipment on site, and to take it down when your event is over.

"Teaching is also part of the package," Keshen adds.

Giant Screen Systems can be booked anywhere from four or five months ahead to one day ahead.

"We're adaptable," Keshen explains.

No two events are exactly alike, so to succeed, he has to fit to each situation as well as he can, he says.

Foresight, however, he ranks even higher.

"This comes largely from experience," he adds. "It's good to adapt to the unexpected – but even better to expect it on the basis of previous experience, and plan for it."

Other rental companies advertising in this supplement are Gawenda & Co. and Chair-Man Mills Inc.

Find the perfect venue - online!

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Looking for a location for their next party or special event, most people are stuck with one of two solutions. Either rely on word of mouth – and end up with the same venue everybody else has used – or search blindly in the Yellow Pages or on Google, struggling against the hype to find a distinctive spot that reflects the occasion.

John Fruitman has a better answer: Venue Source (www.venuesource.ca; 416-238-5555), an online directory that lets you narrow down your search so you get results that are exactly what you're looking for.

The site offers "comprehensive listings on all of Toronto's finest venues," Fruitman says, and allows very specific searches on "everything from capacity to atmosphere type, catering, amenities like free parking or kosher catering.

"For a bar mitzvah, people may want it to be a little more casual or fun… or brides may be looking for an historic mansion…or you can make the search specific so it will only display historic venues in Toronto that can accommodate up to 50 or up to 200 guests."

You're not choosing blindly, either. Once you've found a few locations that seem to match what you're looking for, Venue Source offers 360-degree Virtual Tours.

Just click the "concierge" image in any venue's listing and you're treated to a crystal-clear scrolling panoramic "tour" of the entire location, fully decorated as it would be for an event..

If more than one hall (or deck, or outdoor area) is available, these can be selected from a drop-down menu and then they scroll past in the same way. You control the speed of the tour by clicking and dragging your mouse.

There's also a gallery of still images for each venue, and once you've decided that you'd like more information, full contact details are also available with a single click. Another click takes you to the venue's own website, where you can often find more details like menus and pricing.

The site currently holds information about approximately 150 advertiser venues, with more being added all the time. Either the venue contacts Fruitman or, if a user makes a specific request, he will make the call and invite the venue to take advantage of Venue Source's tens of thousands of visitors monthly.

New listings on the site are highlighted and include a number of harbour cruise ships, Toronto's Botanical Garden and even the Royal Ontario Museum, which is available for groups ranging from 10 to 1000.

"Searching for a perfect venue can be very daunting," Fruitman says. It involves numerous phone calls, travel and other planning before reaching a final decision. By providing important information, like capacity and whether or not it allows outside and/or kosher catering, up front, Venue Source spares users' time and frustration, "We get a lot of emails from people who thank us; it's saved them days and days of research."

King Solomon's cuisine is healthy and delicious

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

King Solomon's Table is a quality caterer that offers excellent kosher food, either in its banquet hall or in an outside venue.

King Solomon's Table (416-630-1666; www.kingsolomonstable.com) caters events that range from gala to intimate, at various different types of venues, including homes, offices, seniors' residences and nightclubs.

As an in-house caterer, King Solomon's Table is popular for brises, baby namings, bar and bat mitzvahs, engagements and wedding receptions. Simchahs of different kinds constitute 95 per cent of its business, says King Solomon's general manager, Joe Elmaleh.

On Saturday evenings and Sunday at lunchtime, King Solomon's Table is not open to the public, as it is reserved for catered events.

Clients may redecorate the banquet hall and bring their own entertainment. King Solomon's Table seats 310. Although it is one large room, it can be partitioned. And wheelchair access, with handicap-accessible washrooms on the main level, make this location welcoming for everyone.

King Solomon's Table has been open since 1993. In the years since, they have accumulated a creditable track record in the catering industry, marrying wisdom with innovation.

King Solomon's offers a variety of menus, with prices that accommodate a full range of budgets, from lavish to modest. They will even custom-design a menu for you – and have fun working on it.

On one occasion, they were catering a 60th wedding anniversary. To convey the feeling that the celebrants were still youthful in spirit, they hit on the idea of using hamburgers, the ultimate "kids' food," in a sophisticated format: canapé-sized mini-hamburgers as hors d'oeuvres, Elmaleh says.

It has become a cliché to say that people are more health conscious than they used to be. But they don't just want food to be good for them: they demand that it be as delicious and tasty as the "bad old" favourites with their high sugar, fat and salt content.

"Kosher cuisine," as Elmaleh points out, "has long since broken free of old stereotypes. Knishes? We don't serve 'em."

Menus feature a variety of fresh ingredients. Soups and desserts are created daily in-house. Main dishes are international and include such favourites as Sicilian Steak and Thai Chicken Monsoon. There's a tempting pasta selection and a Chinese buffet. The takeout menu is extensive as well.

Elmaleh advises booking six months to a year ahead, but you can reserve further in advance if you wish. "If you want an exact date, book further ahead," he recommends.

Toscana Banquet Centre provides multimedia facilities

If there is an emerging buzz phrase in the world of venues for special events, it's "one-stop shop," says Reetu Gupta, director of sales and marketing for the Easton's Group of Hotels.

"People want a venue that has everything," she says.

"That means you don't have to call a separate company to do the lighting, chair covers or DJ. It can all be done within the banquet facility."

This one-stop paradigm is the mantra of the Easton Group's Toscana Banquet and Conference Centre (905-660-5200; www.toscanabanquethall.ca), which is attached to the Hilton Garden Inn.

The new facility in Vaughan offers a variety of rooms for affairs, with the capacity to host everything from weddings and bar mitzvahs to beauty pageants and business seminars.

The attached hotel has 155 rooms and offers preferential rates if guests from your party stay there.

Gupta notes that Toscana co-ordinators will work with clients and/or their party planners to put the entire party together, from the décor and lighting to cuisine and room setup.

"The co-ordinators will stay there all night at the party to help and be the liaison between the client and the vendors to make it easier for them," she says.

She says the one-stop-shop philosophy is a growing trend in venue circles and as such, a growing number of banquet halls are providing multimedia facilities.

For instance, drop-down screens for visual presentations, surround sound and state-of-the-art lighting are becoming more commonplace.

The new facility in Vaughan offers a variety of rooms for services including weddings, bar mitzvahs, beauty pageants and business seminars.

"So rather than having to bring in a separate vendor to do the lighting and décor, PinSpot lighting, for example, can be used to light up the room."

To that end, at a recent affair at Toscana, the PinSpot lighting illuminated the room with shades of pink and orange to create a dusk ambience, and as the night went on, the colours changed to blue and purples, to symbolize the onset of evening.

Before party time, it's important to visit the venue more than once and to ensure the intended room for your party accommodates your guests, Gupta advises.

Sit-down meetings with the event co-ordinators are also key.

With respect to customer service, Gupta emphasizes that the customer needs to be catered to.

"The venue has to work towards what the clients want and what they are comfortable with," she says.

While certain days of the week can increase your chances of availability, it's still recommended to book six months in advance.

Gupta notes the Tosca has a kosher kitchen and party hosts are free to bring in the kosher caterer of their choice.

The facility is currently offering $1,500 in upgrades for weddings booked before June 30, 2007.

So many venues to choose from, so hard to choose just one.

Or is it?

"Unique" is arguably the most overworked word in the banquet/catering vernacular. Many bandy it about, but can any one player truthfully wear its mantle? Is any venue truly in a class of ONE?

Let's look at the facts and figures.

ONE has a history that dates back prior to Confederation. That's old. That's really old. In a good way. Older than your great-great-Bubie. That isn't just a track record, that's a legacy. Think they have enough experience to handle your function?

ONE is young enough in spirit to spend $3 million upgrading its historic premises with state-of-the-art amenities. And forward-thinking enough to bring gustatory innovation to a new level: many of the culinary trends showcased in the city's leading restaurants originated in its kitchens. (As it happens, the aforementioned really old place and this really new place are one and the same).

ONE sits on 22 acres of land recently certified by the Audubon Cooperative Sanctuary Program, and blooms with exquisite flora that would be the envy of many botanical gardens. No need to add greenery when it's already in house.

ONE boasts not one, not two, but three landscaped terraces. No need to decide between celebrating inside or outside; at this venue, you do both.

ONE takes literally the ubiquitous offer of exquisite European cuisine by employing a culinary staff of 150 headed by European-trained chefs of the highest pedigree, from Executive Chef Nigel Didcock to Pastry Chef Renato Del Sol and a variety of other specialists, each a master of his or her craft.

ONE treats the concept of field-to-table freshness not as a perk but as an obligation, with fresh domestic produce arriving daily and fresh fish flown in from Europe thrice weekly.

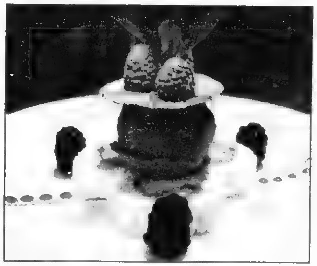
ONE declines to refer to its culinary creations as works of art, instead offering real works of art in the form of a permanent onsite gallery featuring works by noted artists.



ONE is traditionally private, but for special events welcomes the community and members alike.

ONE precludes the need to whittle down your perfect-world wish list to a realistic size. (At this venue, you simply add to it).

MANY preach service and satisfaction. ONE etches it in Granite.

Giveaway gifts are simchah mementoes

By ASHLEY SPEGEL
Special to The CJN

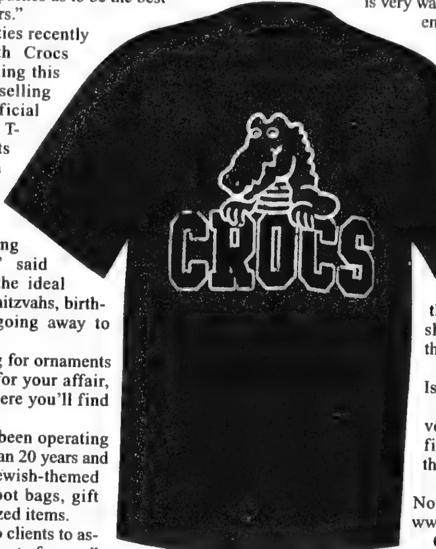
Free stuff is good stuff, and party favours are guaranteed crowd pleasers and mementoes for guests at your celebration.

"Incredible Novelties understands the special events market, because we see what the kids and adults need at parties," says Saul Sacks, one half of the duo that runs Incredible Novelties.

"We see how the products are used at parties, and that gives us a competitive advantage in the industry."

For seven years, Saul and his partner Dan Jankelow have been putting smiles on client's faces by delivering a vast array of knick-knacks and unique apparel at simchahs and other social events. You can thank them for the iPod pillow and NBA waste basket you won last week at your cousin's bat mitzvah, both earned through your shameless John Travolta impersonation on the dance floor.

"We're continuously updating our clients with newest, greatest stuff, and we set the trend for the business," said Sacks. "Seeing how satisfied we make clients and the value they gain out of our service is so rewarding, and it's that satisfaction that pushes us to be the best party favour providers."



Incredible Novelties recently signed a deal with Crocs apparel, and beginning this summer, it will be selling everything from official Crocs footwear to T-shirts, to clients looking for that extra edge at their family affairs.

"We've very excited to be carrying this new product," said Sacks. "Crocs are the ideal prize at bar and bat mitzvahs, birthdays and for kids going away to summer camp."

If you're searching for ornaments with a Jewish twist for your affair, Israel's Judaica is where you'll find everything you need.

The company has been operating in Toronto for more than 20 years and has a wide array of Jewish-themed toys and treats for loot bags, gift baskets and personalized items.

"We sell giftware to clients to assemble into their own party favours," said Amit Bitnun, the manager of Israel's Eglinton location. "We help with personalizing kippot and benchers, [and] we engrave giftware and rent chupahs."

Mezuzahs, tzedakah boxes, kosher cookbooks and videos are just the beginning of what Israel's Judaica has to offer, and Israeli-themed tchatchkes are the retailer's forte.

Its locations in Thornhill and on Eglinton Avenue West are in the heart of Toronto's Jewish community, and both supply Judaica to suit the lifestyles and educational needs of their neighbourhoods.

"Because it's a family-run business, the atmosphere is very warm, friendly and loyal," said Bitnun. "As employees, we care for each other and for the business, and it's reflected in the way we work and interact with our customers."

Reliability, value and excellent customer service are essential when selecting a party favour supplier for your special event, and Incredible Novelties and Israel's Judaica are ideal merchants to turn to.

"We provide the client with the best value for their dollar," said Sacks. "We know what the kids want and how many prizes should be allocated to each party, so there's no money wasted."

Bitnun says the same applies to Israel's.

"Price-wise and variety-wise, we're very well stocked, and clients always find what they need in accordance with their budget."

Rabbi performs humanistic ceremonies

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Eva Goldfinger, the first humanistic rabbi in Canada, conveys her passion for Judaism when officiating at wedding ceremonies and bar/bat mitzahs.

A rabbi at Oraynu Congregation for Humanistic Judaism, Rabbi Goldfinger, 56, says that she wants people to feel the "joy and the embrace of the Jewish people."

Ordained last year at the International Institute of Secular Humanistic Judaism in Farmington Hills, Mich., she said in an interview that humanistic Jews are concerned about the continuity of Judaism, but "we don't pray. We act as if no supreme power is guiding our lives.

"We're very respectful, however, of every mode people choose to express their Judaism. The only thing we don't tolerate is intolerance."

These beliefs may seem like a huge departure from her upbringing in a chassidic family that escaped Hungary in 1957, but the graduate of Bais Yaacov High School said that "I did follow in their footsteps. I just took a different path – a more rational way to express my feelings."

The director of life cycles and adult education at Oraynu, Rabbi Goldfinger said that the congregation has 120 member families and continues to attract new members.

"We have holiday services, adult education programs, youth groups, a Sunday school and a very strong one-year-long bar/bat mitzvah program, which includes an independent research project on a Jewish subject."

Projects have included a study of Jews in medieval Spain, a biblical look at Jewish holidays and an analysis of Holocaust resistance. "These kids come from families that question things, and they typically look at topics in an intellectual way.

"Humanistic Judaism is about Jewish culture, philosophy, ethics, and our place in history. We have a strong identity as Jews, but we're not theistic. We try to convey that to our youth."

She performs wedding ceremonies for anyone who is Jewish and wants a ceremony consistent with who they are, she said.

Rabbi Eva Goldfinger

"If people are interested in expressing their Judaism, I want to make sure we include them in our community. We don't want to lose someone who wants to be Jewish."

When a couple approaches her about performing a wedding ceremony, she asks about their interests and talks about nontheistic traditions, she says.

"If the couple chooses to be married under a chupah, I explain that it is a symbol of inclusivity and that it creates an environment in which parents embrace their children.

"I then write a marriage ceremony for them, and include as little or as much Hebrew as they desire. For the first blessing we express our gratitude for the eternal unfolding of the seasons that has brought us to this momentous occasion. That blessing addresses everyone's spirituality," she says.

She also offers a "gorgeous" candlelighting or wine ceremony, in which parents light candles or fill a glass, and pass them on to their children. "In this way, they're passing on their values and heritage. It is very spiritual and nontheistic."

The wedding package includes a ketubah written in Hebrew and English, or English only, she says.

A service for those who don't like online dating

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Dinnerworks is a personal networking service for single adults of all ages. The company orchestrates intimate group dinners, interactive social events and one-on-one matchmaking.

Founder and original Toronto franchisee Liisa Vexler began operating in the Toronto singles market in 2002, and current owner Susan Kates took over in 2003.

Kates – newly single herself at the time – noticed a Dinnerworks ad for participants in a local newspaper. She had just left a 20-year career in marketing to live out her passion to teach cooking.

Susan Kates

"I thought what a neat way for singles to get together," explains Kates, who is a recent newlywed, but didn't meet her husband through Dinnerworks.

"I was looking for clients to come to my cooking classes, so I approached Liisa. We tried it and people loved it. After about a year of doing the cooking demonstrations for the Dinnerworks community in my home, Liisa approached me to take over the Toronto franchise.

"The way that it works is people go out for dinners in groups. [They may group people based on age or sometimes a theme, such as an interest in travel.]

"I saw that there was an opportunity to be a matchmaker; I had a database, so I did some matches. I was very successful with the first few matches. One couple is married with a baby."

Feeling a need to learn the ins and outs of the business, Kates flew to New York to attend a four-day certified program offered by the Matchmaking Institute and operated by well-known American matchmaker Lisa Clampett.

"The course teaches you about the industry," she says. "One of the problems about matchmaking is people [take advantage of] the vulnerable; I wanted to do something reputable with integrity, which is important to me.

"This is a service for people who don't like online dating. The problem with online dating is that there is a lot of lying and cheating that goes on. This is a lot more real – people like to meet face to face. Nobody is going to participate in Dinnerworks if they aren't really single because there are just too many instances where they are going to run into somebody they know. The six degrees of separation totally apply here. I don't need to ensure people are single – they are going to be."

Kates says a large number of people in the Jewish community are interested in the dinners, events and matchmaking service, and she looks forward to the opportunity of working with Jewish singles.

She says that for the most part, dinners are held in owner-operated "trendy" restaurants and she has access to kosher restaurants when requested.

About 80 per cent of Kates' business consists of events such as barbecues, holiday parties, wine tastings, cooking classes and the restaurant dinners.

The other 20 per cent is devoted to matchmaking. The cost of the matchmaking is approximately $1,000 and is paid for by the party who initially requests the service.

For the dinners there is a service charge for every evening you attend. The cost is in and around $50, but varies according to how many dinners you plan to attend. The service charge covers the setup, a hostess who stays only to introduce the clients, and a welcome cocktail. At the end of the meal, all the daters are responsible for paying for their own consumption.

Under Kates, Dinnerworks has grown to cater to singles not only in the Greater Toronto Area, but throughout southwestern Ontario, Ottawa and Vancouver. She organizes three or four dinners per week and one larger event.

"Dinnerworks is always evolving and addressing the needs of the community as well. I take suggestions from my clients and see what they are interested in. We are very proactive that way," says Kates.

For more information about Dinnerworks contact Susan Kates online at www.dinnerworks.ca or call 416-483-1312.

A consultant helps you plan the perfect party

By ASHLEY SPEGAL
Special to The CJN

Party consultants are essential resources when you want to see your simchah dreams become a reality. In addition to having a multitude of connections and ideas, a consultant will act as a mentor and confidant and provide a shoulder to cry on during those stressful times of doubt and panic.

"It's about working as a team and being comfortable enough to call me up at any time and feel secure knowing I'm there for them," says Rickie Bessner, who's been putting together parties for more than 15 years with her business partner Fern Cohen. "I'm there for my clients, to make sure things work for their simchah the best they can, and I'm there every step of the way for the entire family."

Bessner and Cohen formed their partnership after working together at the same event company. The two are a perfect fit, Bessner says, because they share similar ideas and philosophies, and value the close relationships they establish with their clients.

"Building a respectful relationship with the clients is so important," she says. "At the end of the night, when you see everyone happy, and I receive an abundance of thank yous and appreciation, it's so fulfilling."

Marla Kay has been working the party circuit for 20 years and prides herself on her ability to alleviate her clients' anxiety levels throughout the event planning process.

"After working in the industry for so long, I don't get stressed out because I can't," she says. "It's nice to put your party into someone's hands who has the experience to put it all together, and you know everything will be accomplished without worry."

Kay enjoys working alongside families to create their picture-perfect parties, and sharing her enthusiasm with her clients is her favourite aspect of being a co-ordinator.

"Being an event planner is a personal thing because a lot of emotions are involved between you and the family, and it's not just a business," she says. "It's the excitement that [goes] into planning the party that makes it great, because you share in the excitement together."

Connecting with your party planner is the first and most important step before hiring one to take on the job. You'll want to spend those countless hours of kvetching to someone who understands your concerns and can help you deal with your fears.

"I'm their support group," Bessner says. "I'm there to take the worry off my clients and their guests at the function because that's my job."

Years later, when flipping through your son's bar mitzvah photo album, you'll smile and be grateful that you found the co-ordinator who made it all happen.

And, like some of Kay's clients, you'll want to relive the excitement all over again.

"What's very flattering is that I've come full circle and I'm now doing weddings for the bar mitzvah boys I've worked with," Kay says. "It's very sweet."

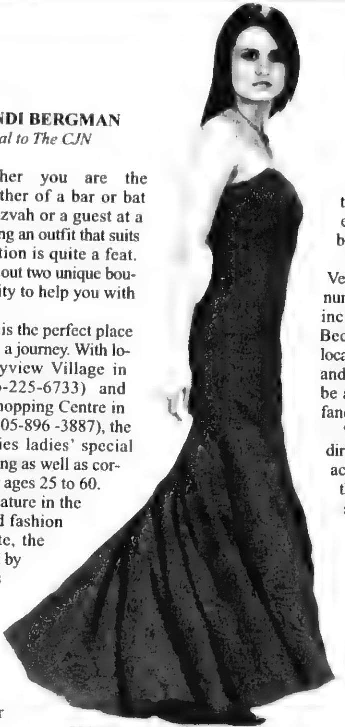
Lots of possibilities when you want to dress up

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN



K.Barketti clothing is exclusively designed for the boutique.

Whether you are the mother of a bar or bat mitzvah or a guest at a simchah, finding an outfit that suits you to perfection is quite a feat. We've scouted out two unique boutiques in the city to help you with your search.

K. Barketti is the perfect place to start on such a journey. With locations at Bayview Village in Toronto (416-225-6733) and Square One Shopping Centre in Mississauga (905-896 -3887), the boutique carries ladies' special occasion clothing as well as corporate suits for ages 25 to 60.

A unique feature in the mass-produced fashion industry of late, the clothing carried by K. Barketti is exclusively designed for the boutique. "We can guarantee that you will never come to a party and be wearing the same thing as someone else," says Terrie Walia, the boutique's owner.

K. Barketti's head of design, Velika Kosteski, has dressed a number of Canadian celebrities, including singer Amy Sky. Because the design team is located in Toronto, styling, sizing and creation of the dresses can be adjusted according to your fancy.

"Customers can work directly with the design team to achieve the look they want for their special occasion." Walia says.

Kosteski can also create custom designed dresses by appointment. In store, K. Barketti carries sizes 2 to 26, and other sizes can be ordered by measurement.

"Customers are all different, so there can't be a limit on what sizes we make available to them," Walia says.

Tending toward the classic, the design team tries to stay away from ostentatious trends. "Special occasion clothing should not be too wild," Walia says. "We have lots of soft colours like pastel pink, a muted lime green, as well as browns in the store at the moment."

For mother-of-the-bride suits, brocade and dupioni silk are among the favourite fabrics. "A very classic look [is best for] this type of suit," Walia says.

Whether they have already designed it or will design it exclusively for you, the team at K. Barketti can make your dream outfit a reality. For more information, visit www.kbarketti.com.

For a completely different take on women's fashion, head to One Funky Avenue (416-784-1234), which is located at 1912-A Avenue Rd., Unit 1. A brand new addition to the Avenue shopping area, One Funky Avenue offers an eclectic mix of vintage consignment clothing, as well as jewelry and Judaica.

"I've been shopping in Kensington Market and on Queen Street since I was 15. That was the type of atmosphere I wanted the store to have," says Annette Hoffman, the store's owner, who has a background in real estate and speech writing. "The unique feel to this store is very much a part of who I am."

The store is equally split between the consignment shop and the "bling bling" room, and the items carried by Hoffman are anything but ordinary.

"In the consignment shop, I carry everything from a Chanel dress to a Gap T-shirt to Stuart Weitzman shoes," she says. "People really love the idea of consignment, of getting something back for their clothes."

Hoffman carries newly designed handbags as well, and in the "bling bling" room, you'll find one-of-a-kind jewelry pieces as well as various Judaica including kiddush cups and menorahs.

"I carry a mix of Israeli and locally designed jewelry," Hoffman says. "And while you're there, you can pick up a bar mitzvah gift!"

Hoffman will continue her special occasion speech writing from the store. Kick back and relax – at One Funky Avenue your every need will be taken care of.

Liberty Group has a venue to suit your needs

By ERIC LAYMAN
Special to The CJN

Are you planning an event and aren't sure exactly what kind of venue will suit you? Call Liberty Group (416-542-3789 or 416-LIBERTY) or visit www.libertygroup.com. One call will open up a range of possibilities.

Founded in 1987, the Liberty Group's first venue was PM Toronto, a bar on Carlton Street, east of Church Street on the north side, says Liberty's director of sales and catering Robert Rosset.

Near Maple Leaf Gardens, it drew a clientele of athletes and fans and was one of Toronto's first "sports bars."

Since then, Liberty Group has continued to set trends.

It offers what Rosset calls "a portfolio of venues": Liberty Grand, Live@Courthouse, Rosewater Room, Rosewater Supper Club, C-Lounge, and Phoenix Concert Theatre. They're also involved with Harbourfront hospitality services and will take on two new venues in the fall.

"We don't do the same thing twice," says Rosset. "Each locale is unique, with its own special blend of food, ambience and/or entertainment."

The Liberty Grand

- Formerly the Ontario Government Building at the Ex, the Liberty Grand Entertainment Complex was built in 1927. The complex offers culinary distinction in a 1900s-Renaissance setting, with a spectacular lakefront view. Ideal for weddings, bar and bat mitzvahs, anniversaries and corporate events, it has various rooms that can host from 150 to 3,000 people.
- Live@Courthouse is located in Toronto's historic 1852 courthouse building. The elegant Courthouse Chamber Lounge was once the home of Toronto's Arts and Letters Club and the watering place of the Group of Seven painters. The Courthouse Market Grille offers a more informal setting.
- Minutes from the financial district, the Rosewater Supper Club is in the former Consumers Gas building (1854). It has won three DiRoNA (Distinguished Restaurants of North America) awards for 2003, 2004 and 2005. The main dining room accommodates 100 for dining and 300 for cocktails. The mezzanine can accommodate up to 60. Above the supper club, the Rosewater Room, just opened, accommodates 200 guests.
- C-Lounge unites indoor and outdoor spaces, marrying features of spa and night club. You can sip a refreshing drink while having your hair or makeup touched up.
- The Phoenix Concert Theatre changed Toronto nightlife by introducing multi-rooms and multi-formatting, and it's hosted celebrities such as Rush, Sarah McLachlan and Nelly Furtado.

While none of Liberty's venues are kosher, all can accommodate kosher caterers.

Add some oomph to your wardrobe

By RANDI BERGMAN
Special to The CJN

Lingerie isn't something you have to keep a secret anymore. If you are looking for something to add a little feminine oomph to your wardrobe, the best place to start is underneath your clothes.

Tryst Lingerie (416-484-6678), at 465 Eglinton Ave. W., is a perfect place to find such goodies – in every size, shape and colour! Whether you are shopping for special occasion lingerie, sleepwear or a bra that fits perfectly, Tryst offers an unbeatable selection matched only by the superb customer service.

Carrying brand name sleepwear and bras with labels such as Betsey Johnson, Oscar de la Renta, Princess Tam-Tam and Chantelle, Tryst, which is co-owned by the mother and daughter team of Louise Sommers and Shayna Tilbrook, offers high-quality lingerie at accessible prices. And since nearly every woman is more than aware of the trials and tribulations that go into finding a bra that actually fits, you'll be happy to know that Tryst is not only home to an extensive selection of bras (AA-JJ cups and 28-52 back), but also to some of the best bra fitters in the country.

Shopping at Tryst is like hanging out with friends. "We really love our customers," Sommers says. "We always want to make them feel as comfortable and as catered to as possible."

A unique feature of the boutique is that it hosts private lingerie parties for its customers – a perfect way to celebrate a birthday or upcoming wedding, or just to have a good time. Party guests munch on treats while Tillbrook gives an exclusive (and I believe crucial) lesson in bra fitting. Guests also receive complimentary bra consultations.

"Starting with the right undergarments makes all the difference," Sommers says. With such a selection and the expertise to go with it, Tryst makes it virtually impossible to go wrong!

Another fantastic boutique to visit for all things lingerie is Underwraps Lingerie (416-782-5779). Located at 3183 Bathurst St. just north of Lawrence Avenue, Underwraps has been carrying high-quality robes, nightgowns, pajamas, shells, slippers and loungewear for more than six years. To compliment the lingerie, Underwraps also carries unique lines of silver and costume jewelry as well as jewelry boxes.

Carrying only the best in sleepwear, Underwraps imports designs from Italy, France and Switzerland. Fabrics are100 per cent European cotton and silk.

Underwraps also carries a wide array of lingerie styles for brides. "We have everything from a very feminine ruffled look to a clean and tailored silhouette," Mann says.

Referring to seasonal trends, Mann says that for spring they are seeing "very feminine colours like pastel pinks and turquoises. Complimenting these colours, we are also seeing a lot of very rich browns."

Citing brown as a major colour for the season, Mann says brown will be popular into next fall.

Underwraps caters to a wide range of customers and has sleepwear for everyone. Whether your preference is for short, long, sleeveless, capped-sleeve, long-sleeved or 2-piece, Underwraps has it. In addition, these options are available in sizes extra-small to double extra-large. With such a selection, the only trouble will be choosing what to buy!

With the advantages offered by boutiques like Tryst and Underwraps, shopping for lingerie is no longer a necessity – it's a pleasure!

Couples from abroad getting married in Israel

By DINA KRAFT
JTA

In recent years an increasing number of Jewish couples from abroad looking for an alternative to a formal wedding at home or a more typical remote destination in the Caribbean or Tuscany have decided on Israel as the place to break the glass and officially start their lives together.

"We are very casual and would not have had a black-tie wedding," said Gena Bresgi, 23, of New York City, who was married last year in a large glass hall amid the lush gardens of a kibbutz. "Our wedding had a nice feel, very relaxed. There was not that high pressure."

It was her husband's first visit to Israel, and together the two families toured the country. Close friends and relatives who came used the wedding as part of an Israeli vacation, too.

With relatives around the world, Israel proved to be an ideal place to gather, Bresgi said.

"I have a lot of family in Israel and all over the world," she said. "This was a more central meeting place for everyone."

Some couples marry in candlelit caves, others choose a chupah wrapped in gauzy silk and lilies on a beach or a rooftop overlooking Jerusalem's Old City at sunset.

Beyond the dramatic settings, gourmet food, guaranteed good weather between May and late September and informal feel, Israeli weddings tend to run just a fraction of the cost of a wedding in the United States, Europe or Australia.

For example, couples said they paid about half of what they would have for weddings in the United States and about a quarter of what they would have in England.

The help of a bilingual wedding planner can reduce the stress considerably, recent brides and grooms said. Also, venues in Israel tend to be one-stop shops, providing not just the setting but also the design of the event, florists and catering.

Israeli weddings tend to run just a fraction of the cost

Of course, there are cultural differences. The lack of formality may puzzle those living outside of Israel and expect, for example, to be served by waiters and have the chupah start on time – neither of which happens at a wedding in Israel. But as the number of foreign Jews coming to Israel for weddings increases, more venues are learning to cater to their needs, from adding enough chairs for all the guests at the chupah – Israelis usually stand – to making sure the musicians or disc jockeys keep the volume within reason.

Joan Summerfield, a wedding and event planner who started Anglo Israel Events Ltd. in 1993, said the political situation plays a role in weddings from abroad as it does with tourism in general.

Summerfield noted that after the Lebanon war last summer, there was a brief drop in inquiries. But she said her weddings were not cancelled because of the fighting. Those with plans for weddings in the north did what other Israelis did – they moved their celebrations southward.

Summerfield, originally from England, said having a planner was almost essential in helping a couple from abroad navigate the Israeli-overseas divide.

"You really need someone to bring it all together," said Summerfield, who helps oversee all aspects of the celebration.

Shani Falik Roth, an event planner who runs the company Eventfully Yours, says she helps couples with everything: venue selection, caterers, invitations, photographers, florists, benchers, hotels, touring arrangements and hospitality bags.

Roth also helps couples and their families grappling with differences in the Israeli culture, including the aversion of some Israeli vendors to signing contracts.

"There is a lot of explaining, a lot of hand holding, a lot of expectations that need to be managed. Otherwise there can be disappointment," she said.

"People think things will be more western, more similar to where they come from. We find our job includes explaining things, especially how and why things are different yet special in Israel."

Judy Krasna, who runs Celebrate Israel, a website that helps people from abroad plan events, says couples also are drawn to Israel for the intimate, more meaningful wedding experience it can provide.

The number of guests who come tend to be smaller because of the distance, so those who attend typically are among the couple's family and closest friends.

Krasna has seen two trends recently: those who want to marry in Jerusalem, specifically near the Old City for the historical and spiritual connection, and those who seek natural outdoor settings, from national parks to beaches or even near archeological sites.

"Israel offers so many venues," Krasna said, noting two of her recent favourites – the northern coastal town of Rosh Hanikra, where the bride and groom can ride to their wedding on cable cars overlooking cliffs and the Mediterranean below, and Neot Kedumim, a biblical landscape preserve where the couple and their guests walk down a torch lighted pathway lined with pomegranate and fig trees and quotes about love and marriage from the Song of Songs.

Debbie Goldman, 22, of Manchester, England, is planning an August wedding in Jerusalem along a promenade overlooking the Old City. She and her fiancé decided to marry in Israel after becoming engaged here and attending the weddings of several friends.

They were impressed by the casual ease and meaningful settings.

"It's a different type of wedding altogether, much more spiritual, not so formal like an English wedding," she said.

After seeing her sister deal with the stress of planning a wedding closer to home, Goldman is relieved to have Krasna's company help her make the arrangements.

Even for the usually thorny bureaucracy of Israel's Orthodox rabbinate, which oversees issues of marriage in Israel, there is help from a new non-governmental organization called ITEM, the Jewish Life Information Center. The centre aims to help Jews from Israel and abroad navigate the rabbinate and its regulations.

Through its website, couples can register online and find the information on the documentation they will need. ITEM will prepare their file and bring it to the rabbinate for approval.

"We want people to have a meaningful event," said Rabbi Set Farmer, who founded the centre. "We don't want the rabbinate to be a stumbling block for them or an obstacle."

The centre also provides information on motels in Israel for couples who return for the ritual circumcision.

Tips for honeymooners on cruises or travelling abroad

Whether a couple has a modest reception or a gala function, they welcome a break after all the preparations involved in planning their wedding. They also look forward to getting away from the regular routine and having some time to enjoy each other's company away from their career and social commitments.

For all of these reasons, cruises have always been popular honeymoon choices. In addition to being exciting, a cruise is a relaxing way to vacation.

Some couples, on the other hand, also make plans to live abroad for two or three months following the honeymoon. For instance, a couple who have just graduated from university may decide to take a few months and explore another environment before settling down to domesticity at home.

According to Foreign Affairs Canada, cruise ships are among the safest forms of transportation and entertainment. Nevertheless, the government advises Canadians to take certain precautions to ensure their well-being during a cruise. Couples travelling abroad and living in a foreign country are also cautioned to heed the following government tips.

Cruise is a relaxing way to travel

- Purchase travel and health insurance, including coverage for accidental injury and medical needs. The provincial health plan may cover very little, or even nothing.
- Carry your valid Canadian passport when in transit to another country to join the cruise. Keep a photocopy of your passport's identification page.
- Leave a copy of your itinerary, passport ID page, and travel and health insurance policy with family or close friends in Canada.
- Keep cash and valuables in the ship's safe, not in your cabin.
- Minimize signs of wealth in your jewelry and clothing to avoid becoming a target.
- Always check the ship's departure time before going ashore. Protect your safety during shore excursions by checking if your tour guides are reputable and insured.
- Contact your physician or CLSC a couple of months before departure to determine your need for immunizations and preventive medication and other health measures to avoid illness.
- Watch what you eat and drink. Tell the cruise line if you have dietary needs. Always drink only bottled water while ashore. If need be, inquire if the ship has handicap-access before booking.
- Always bring an extra pair of eyeglasses in case of breakage or loss.
- Learn the laws and study the customs of countries you will visit.
- Stay safe by participating in lifeboat drills. Ensure that there are enough life jackets in your cabin and become familiar with evacuation procedures.

Foreign Affairs Canada has prepared a booklet titled Bon Voyage, telephone 1-800-267-6788 or visit Consular Affairs Web site: www.voyage.gc.ca for more information.

- travel report for your destination country
- itinerary and budget
- health and travel insurance
- passport expiry date, and make copies
- entry visas and departure tax
- vaccinations, medication, prescriptions, medical certificate, supplies, extra pair of glasses
- flight preparation
- registration with the Canadian government office abroad (online)
- dual citizenship: is it an issue?
- money: local currency, traveller's cheques, etc.
- rules for bringing back goods: receipts for purchases, special arrangements for food, animals, plants, etc.

Dinner parties raise funds for youth aliyah projects in Israel

By BARBARA SILVERSTEIN
Special to The CJN

On a Monday evening in late spring, dozens of women of all ages are milling around a gracious home in Forest Hill. Everyone seems to be engaged in conversation.

The excitement in the air is palpable as the women gather in the foyer greeting friends or wandering around the main floor sipping white wine and drinking in the elegant surroundings.

The women are attending the fourth annual At Our Table, a dinner party organized by Tzedakah chapter of Toronto Hadassah-WIZO to raise funds for youth aliyah projects in Israel. This event has drawn some 220 supporters who have come out, as the invitation read: "to celebrate the joy of entertaining."

The evening includes an elegant buffet dinner, and presentations on design and entertainment trends by well-known experts. This year, Craig Gruzd of Designing Trendz, a full service event-planning company, and television personalities Nik Manojlovich and Debbie Van Kiekebelt are the presenters.

At Our Table is the brainchild of event co-chairs Robyn Greenspan and Jeannie Sklar. About four years ago, the two women were brainstorming to find a novel way to raise money for youth aliyah. "We wanted to do something different, something that our peers would enjoy," recalls Greenspan.

"We came up with the idea of having an intimate evening in a home. We were excited and nervous. This was something we hadn't done before."

As for finding a venue, Sklar suggested that Greenspan offer her house and they approached her next-door neighbour about using her home as well. She happened to be the mother of one of the Tzedakah chapter members.

At the first At Our Table there were demonstrations by celebrity chefs. The women separated into two groups to see the presentation given at each house and then switched places, Greenspan recounts.

"It all came together beautifully. The first evening was such a success we knew we had a winner. People loved the intimate warm feel of the evening."

The first year 125 people attended and the chapter raised $30,000, says Sklar, noting that they were able to get a lot of donations and community support. "We were amazed at how generous and open people were. "

Everyone in the chapter did what they could to get the community involved, says Greenspan. "The members [asked for] for donations, and we were able put together great raffle prizes from the get-go. It was surprisingly easy to get the donations. People liked the idea."

They continue to get corporate donations, which include raffle items, flowers, food, and printing, says Sklar. "The presenters give their time and energy "

The next year, Greenspan and Sklar decided not to tamper with their recipe for success. Two members of the Tzedakah chapter living across the street from each other opened their homes to 150 women, says Greenspan. "We sold out within a few days. People knew that space was limited so they replied as fast as they could."

The third year – the event was co-chaired by Susan Lindzon and Gali Azour – the chapter was able to get one large house with a tented backyard, says Sklar. "That made it possible for us to increase our numbers that much more. We had 220 attending and we still had to turn people away."

This year another large house was offered for the event and one of the corporate sponsors, Downtown Fine Cars covered the cost of tenting the backyard, she says.

All the catering was provided by Food Magic. "We're got the ingredients and they took care of preparations."

Sklar says the generosity of people and corporations is overwhelming, pointing out that all their printing which includes invitations, raffle tickets, programs and corporate packages, is provided by Paper Ideas. "Sam [Kanter of Paper Ideas] is so enthusiastic about this event, he already has a design for next year's invitation."

She says At Our Table raised $70,000 this year. "Last year we raised $60,000. It jumped from $30,000 the year before to $60,000 last year. This year, we're very excited that we've surpassed all our previous goals."

She says they rely a lot on corporate donations to keep the price of the dinner tickets affordable.

The evening is a labour of love and dedication, says Sklar. "For this evening to come together, it takes months and months of work with the co-chairs, vice chairs and the whole committee. We started working on this year's event last June.

There's approximately 15 committee members working with support from the entire chapter, she explains. The committee is further broken down into smaller committees that are responsible for such things as corporate sponsorship, food, raffle donations, gift bags, decor and technical support, "They all work within their committees and they're always liaising with Robyn and myself. Robyn sand I talk almost every day."

Sklar says the work is very gratifying. "Putting on an event of this scale is quite an undertaking, but working on such a worthy cause never makes us feel burdened in any way.

"It's truly a pleasure and an honour to raise this money because social services in Israel is so strapped. The country has so many competing needs for money and so we're thrilled to be able to make such a contribution."

About Life

Dear Ella,

My son recently got engaged. I know this should be a very happy time, but it has been nothing but bad feelings and fighting since the announcement. Noah, who was once a kind, respectful boy is being swallowed up by his fiancee's family.

My husband and I have worked very hard all our lives. We live a modest lifestyle. Noah is marrying into a wealthy family and the wedding plans have gotten out of control. Sandi's parents expect us to split the cost of the wedding. Normally, I would not have a problem with that, but the extravagant affair they are planning is way over our budget. Noah is angry with us. He claims we are being cheap at his expense. This has caused so many hurt feelings and is ripping our family apart. I don't know what to do.

Wedding Woes

Dear Wedding Woes

First, congratulations on your son's engagement. There are a number of things you need to do. The first is making your son understand your situation. You have to remember how caught up he is in this. Sure, he wants the best wedding for his new bride and himself, but he is losing sight of what's really important: family.

Is he embarrassed that his family is not of the same means as Sandi's? Is there a reason he would have thought that you could contribute half the cost? You need to sit down with him when tempers are not flared and lay your cards on the table.

In the past, many of the wedding expenses were paid for by the bride's family. Today, that is not the case. Usually, families discuss expenses and it is certainly not unheard of for the bride and groom to pitch in as well.

That being said, you can't expect Sandi's family to have a modest wedding when they want and can afford a lavish one, but you need to set guidelines about what your role is in this.

Meet with Sandi and her parents. Tell them what you have allocated to spend on the wedding and ask them how many guests this will cover. You may not be able to have as many people as Sandi's side. Offer your help (not financial) in any way you can.

A wedding does not have to put you in the poorhouse. With a little honesty and understanding, it should be a happy time for everyone.

SUMMER MAKEUP 2007

Summer is the most rejuvenating time of the year. A natural, low-maintenance look is what we all strive for, although the nude makeup look is a lot harder to achieve than the painted face. Still, "less is more" is our best motto, as the heat and humidity can cause heavily applied makeup to become streaked and matted.

We are also more health and beauty conscious during the hot months. As the shorts and T-shirts come out of the closet, we realize that those extra five pounds have to go.

Why not wake up 30 minutes earlier and have a brisk walk? Be sure to get your heart rate up to increase your circulation and strengthen your heart and respiratory muscles. Aerobic exercise should be done for a minimum of 20 minutes, to help burn fat. A low-fat diet will also help you achieve your goal. Drink lots of water, eat lots of fruit and vegetables, and remember, if you keep fit, your body will function better.

Enchanting
CELINE DION
PARFUMS

Enchanting is a sophisticated new fragrance.

It is equally important to protect your skin from the harmful rays of the sun by using sunscreen with at least a 15 SPF. We know a suntan looks and feels great, but try a tan in a bottle or some of the new and wonderful bronzers. It is imperative to cleanse your skin thoroughly, follow with a skin refresher to suit your skin type and make sure to use a lightly formulated moisturizer. A great summer makeup look can only be achieved with good skin, so the sooner you get started the sooner you can enjoy this wonderful time of year.

Toronto-based plastic surgeon Dr. Atul Kesarwani believes that although a healthy lifestyle, with proper diet and exercise, is the key, cosmetic surgery may have a role to play in kick-starting your change.

Breast enhancement with implants or lifts that tighten the skin can make you feel better, Kesarwani says. He has a reputation for performing natural-looking breast surgery, after taking the time to understand exactly what the patient is looking for and helping her make the right decision. The new cohesive gel implants look and feel great and are considered safe and long-lasting.

Another procedure, a tummy tuck, will eliminate loose abdominal skin, remove fat and tighten muscles. The decrease in dress and pant size will encourage you to look for a new wardrobe, and the results will last a lifetime.

Commonly performed at Kesarwani's Cosmedical Clinic is the "Yummy Mummy" procedure in which breast augmentation and tummy tuck are done together after moms have finished having their kids. Doing both procedures together will provide a more complete result, with a single recovery period that involves less down time than people think.

Liposuction is another way some people choose to recontour the body shape. It's done by removing fat from areas that are resistant to diet and exercise. Thinning the layer of fat from bulges on your thighs, tummy, and even arms, buttocks or neck, can help you feel better about the way you look.

You can consult Kesarwani at the Cosmedical Rejuvenation Clinic, www.cosmedical.ca.

Maurice Fiorio tells us that summer can't come soon enough for most of us. So it's time to get a "head" start!

Heavy fringe – although it started this winter, the wicked looking fringe trend is most prominent as we go into spring and summer. Taking their inspiration from people like Michelle Pfeiffer's strong and rebellious character in 1983's Scarface, these bangs are showing up everywhere.

Waves of any length are also in. The more natural looking the better. A short, layered look with lots of texture and a longer bang is cool for the summer.

If it's colour you're after, here is what you should know. While all colours are acceptable, it has been said that warm shades of brown are hot for summer this season. If you are inclined to go red, try out a warm brown instead.

HAIR: Experience nature's beauty with Summer Solstice, the Goody hair accessories collection for summer, which evokes the tranquillity of the warm season. The earth inspires the collection's materials, which include shells, cottons and light linens, and wood that adds a distinct look to the collection and is sure to be the ideal accent for your favourite summer outfit.

Harsh external conditions such as pollution and seasonal climate changes are among the many factors contributing to itching and sensitive scalp, which is why L'Oréal Professionnel created Sensi Balance, designed to be remarkably effective in de-stressing, soothing and moisturizing the scalp, leaving hair shiny, beautiful and easy to manage. Sensi Balance is comprised of two products: sensi balance shampoo and sensi post-treatment.

Toronto fashionista caters to her clients

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

She's only 30 years old, but it's been years since Naomi Berkel first established herself as a major player in Toronto's fashion scene.

Berkel was 24 when she opened Bella, a clothing boutique that has since been featured in Canadian fashion magazines and has attracted the attention of some of Hollywood's hottest stars, among them Lindsay Lohan, Kirsten Dunst and Courtney Cox Arquette.

"I've always been interested in it. It's in my blood. My great-grandfather was a tailor… I've always, even when I was younger, had subscriptions to fashion magazines, like Elle, Vogue, Bizarre, all of them. I've always appreciated designers, and I have a real appreciation for the craft," Berkel said.

After having grown up in Toronto and enrolling herself in the International Academy of Design and Technology, Berkel moved to New York when she was 23 to study at the prestigious Parsons School of Design.

When she returned home from New York, she landed a job at a clothing store she basically ran herself.

She said that after listening to her boss' clients about what they wanted, she realized that he wasn't willing to cater to his clients' needs

"I saw a great opportunity and a great space and a great location," she said.

Berkel decided that she wanted to buy the store from her boss, but first she had to get support from her father, a businessman.

"I pitched the idea to my dad. He laughed and said, 'If we're going to do this, you have to be serious about it and do all your due diligence beforehand'… He asked me to come up with a professional business plan. He approved and I opened up Bella in 2001."

Since then, Berkel has dedicated herself to making sure her store carries clothing that is fun and feminine, classic yet trendy.

"I travel every four weeks and I go to L.A., New York and Miami, and I try to find hot, cool lines that will compliment my customers," she said.

"I was the first person to bring Uggs into Canada," she said, referring to the trendy sheepskin boot that originated in Australia.

Naomi Berkel

She said that the most challenging aspect of her job is finding the collections that are right for her store.

"You have to be clairvoyant. Now, it's May and next month, I have to buy for spring/summer of next year. So you have to make sure that the trends that you're showing are conducive to your client's style," she said, adding that she also likes to give young, struggling designers the opportunity to showcase their designs in her store.

Berkel's passion for fashion is unmistakable, and she exudes this passion while discussing something as simple as a white T-shirt.

Sitting on a couch near the fitting rooms in Bella on Eglinton Avenue, Berkel jumps out of her seat to pull a James Perse T-shirt off the shelf to admire the craftsmanship that went into making it.

"It's like satin and it's phenomenal. It's cotton but it's Italian weaved. It's sewn phenomenally… To me, that's quality. It's not going to rip," she said.

"I appreciate fabrics, I appreciate clothing construction. I can spot quality. I don't buy the $6 T-shirts because they're not worth it and I would never wear it. I'm not a snob, but I like quality. Can I justify a $100 T-shirt? You're damn right I can."

Berkel, a self-described workaholic, is so dedicated to providing fashionable Torontonians with the best, that she decided in 2004 to venture into the unfamiliar world of maternity wear.

She said that she was inspired to open Kick Maternity, just a few doors down from Bella, after her sister-in-law got pregnant.

"When I went around Toronto, L.A. and New York, there was nothing that I would buy for her, being in the fashion industry and having a boutique. Everything was horrendous.

"If you care about how you look when you're not pregnant, you're for sure going to care how you look even more so when you are pregnant."

Berkel and her co-owner, Lisa Gnat, provide yummy mummies with designer dresses, skirts and jeans that a woman would want to wear even when she isn't pregnant.

As if running two designer stores in Toronto isn't time-consuming enough, Berkel recently joined forces with her friend Jodi Levstein to open Pink Heart, another boutique on Eglinton, that offers funky gifts and accessories for those who are bored with bringing a chocolate babka to their mother's house for dinner.

"I was tired of bringing wine and flowers for Shabbat. Now I bring stunning crystal wine stoppers, or a serving piece," she said, adding that the Pink Heart carries anything from cake stands and plates, to candles and chemical-free cleaning products.

The granddaughter of Holocaust survivors and a first-generation Canadian with one parent from Israel, Berkel identifies strongly with her Jewish heritage.

She speaks Hebrew, is nearly fluent in Yiddish, and speaks passionately about the idea of keeping Jewish tradition a priority for her generation.

She gives back to the community by donating to organizations such as Jacob's Ladder and synagogues – Holy Blossom Temple and Temple Sinai Congregation – and supports Israel's art community by carrying products made by Israeli designers.

"I make a point at the Pink Heart to carry a lot of Israeli designer lines because I feel like what is fabulous about Israel is a lot of the art."

She said that just two days after she opened the store, an affluent Jewish woman came in with a request for a beautiful, handmade seder plate from Israel she'd seen in a magazine.

"She said, 'I found this in a magazine. I don't know what it's called, I just know it's the most beautiful seder plate. You have to get it for me.' [The ad] only had the designer's name. And she said, 'By the way, I need it in two weeks,'" Berkel recalled.

She said she stayed up until 4 a.m. to reach the designer in Israel, and two weeks later, six handmade seder plates made their way from Tel Aviv to Toronto.

Having her hand in three stores in one of Toronto's trendiest neighbourhoods is a challenge, but Berkel wouldn't have it any other way.

"It's tough and it's exhausting and it's stressful, and you just take it one season at a time. But I wouldn't do anything else in the world. I love my stores, I love my clients, and I'm here every day, seven days a week."

EYESHADOW, EYELINER AND MASCARA: The near naked look for eye shadow is hot for this summer's collection. Cargo introduces the Limited Edition Eye Shadow Palette. Selections of five easy to wear neutrals are positioned in a unique block formation in an all-in-one convenient clear package.

For illuminating eyes with a seductive shimmer, Estée Lauder's Bronze Goddess Collection features Pure Color Eyeshadow in new limited edition metallic shades of Bronze Goddess and Gilded Goddess.

Lise Watier presents Frozen Pearl. This ingenious new eyeshadow, which looks like an elegant pen, delivers the perfect amount of colour that glides with smoothness on the lid. This fresh formula leaves a wonderful, cool sensation on the skin, and is great for hot and humid days. Frozen Pearl dries instantly, is longwearing and is crease-free for hours!

Lancôme Paris introduces Ombre Glacée Rose Bali, for a new sensory experience. A cooling gel eye shadow, it brings comfort and hydration to the eyelids and provides lasting colour. The packaging is decorated with gold and pink and has a Brazilian bracelet attached to the tube, which becomes a trendy accessory for the summer.

Embark on an exotic journey to a mystical island with Elizabeth Arden's Color Intrigue Gel Eyeliner Duo in deep brown/hot bronze and black sand/blue water. Use these smooth, longwearing colours to line and define eyes. It comes with a deluxe brush for precise application.

Whether you are a movie star or not, you want movie star eyes that shine and turn heads. Chanel has put the spotlight on the eyes with the arrival of two new products, the Inimitable Waterproof Mascara and the Stylo Yeux waterproof long-lasting eyeliner. To all the summer brides, this is what you have been waiting for. Don't miss out!

LIPS: A new era in lip gloss has arrived – a luxurious lip gloss that has it all! Estée Lauder introduces New Pure Color Gloss, a new formula that offers a comfortable, glossy texture that never feels sticky and with continued use over time, will leave the lips looking smoother than ever before. Pure Color Gloss is available in two long-wearing finishes, Pure Color Gloss and Pure Color Crystal Gloss.

Rouge Wow lipstick from Lise Watier brings two new shades with high-pigmented colour, wonderful staying power, non-sticky texture and the unparalleled shine of a gloss, with all the comfort of a traditional lipstick.

The DKNY Be Delicious Shine Collection is a limited edition of flirty, scented items that light up your face and body. DKNY Be Delicious Lip Shine Trio is three lip glosses in three juicy shades – Fuji Red, Pink Lady and Anjou Blush. It is packaged in a three-tiered swivel pot, and you can carry this wardrobe of colour wherever you go.

FRAGRANCES: For the men who exemplify personal style and exquisite taste, Kiton Black is a sophisticated, masculine and tailored fragrance with a European contemporary freshness. The charismatic outer carton is deep black with a Kiton Black Label in black and white. It is available in an eau de toilette and after shave exclusively at Holt Renfrew.

Coty Canada introduces New, Limited Edition, Summer Fragrance. For men who are looking for the ultimate summer scent, Calvin Klein has created Eternity for Men Summer. This fragrance contains ocean air, coriander and watermelon, for a clean scent.

The new fragrance by Elizabeth Arden, Mediterranean, was inspired by Catherine-Zeta-Jones and her love of the Mediterranean. This elegant fragrance transports you to that captivating place.

A fresh new take on Chanel's fragrance Chance has arrived. Chance Eau Fraîche is a sparkling green, fresh fragrance ready to burst out of its bottle.

Celine Dion Parfums and Coty Beauty present Enchanting, a sophisticated new fragrance designed in a bottle that is tall and graceful, reminiscent of a long, flowing gown. It is a fragrance that is a reminder to every woman that she has the power of enchantment.

Be sure to enjoy the summer while taking good care of your skin. It's the first thing people will see upon meeting you, so make it look your best using our fun and exciting tips for the summer of 2007.

PQ, BQ members march against Israel

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Parti Québécois MNA Daniel Turp and Bloc Québécois MP Réal Ménard led a demonstration in downtown Montreal last weekend denouncing Israel's "illegal occupation" of Palestinian land and its practice of "apartheid."

The coalition that organized the event, led by the major labour federations, the Confédération des syndicats nationaux and the Centrale des syndicats du Québec, also called on the Canadian government to revoke the charitable status of the Jewish National Fund. The coalition charges that the JNF discriminates against non-Jews in its allocation of land and is dispossessing Palestinians.

Turp is the PQ's spokesperson for international affairs and Ménard is the co-chair, with Liberal Quebec Senator Lucie Pépin, of a new parliamentary association for Palestine. They walked in the front row of the noisy demonstrators as they marched from Dorchester Square, which is across the street from the Israeli consulate,

Ontario PCs promise to fund faith schools

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Ontario Progressive Conservative party has pledged to directly fund non-Catholic, faith-based schools that join the public education system if the party is elected on Oct. 10.

John Tory

Provincial PC leader John Tory made the announcement while speaking at a June 8 Habitat for Humanity event, which he attended just prior to his party's "Countdown '07" two-day policy conference in Toronto.

"I think there are some things on which you have to stand on principle, and in this case the principle is fairness to people of other faiths," he was quoted as saying in the Toronto Star.

"John Tory and the PC Party believe that we need to achieve more effective integration of Ontario's increasingly diverse student population into the mainstream of our province," the party's newly released platform states. "That's why we are committed to creating an opportunity for non-Catholic, faith-based schools to choose to join our publicly funded education system the same way Catholic schools have already done.

"Our policy will apply only to faith-based schools and we believe that the best results would be achieved through direct funding rather than through tax credits."

The Star reported that Tory said he would not bring back a tax credit for private school tuition, which was introduced by the previous Conservative government and repealed by the Liberals. It was criticized for not differentiating between faith-based and other private schools, as well as for not tying the credit to school accountability.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Chevra Kadishas Meet

EDMONTON — Delegates from the United States, Canada and Britain came to the West Edmonton Mall this week for the fifth annual North American Chevra Kadisha Conference. It's the first time the conference has been held outside the United States and in a city with such a relatively small number of Jews. The Edmonton Chevra Kadisha hosted the June 10-12 meeting in honour of its 100th anniversary.

Jews Join Inquiry Call

TORONTO — B'nai Brith Canada joined leaders of Toronto's black community in calling for a public inquiry into the killing of Jordan Manners, the 15-year-old who was shot last month in the halls of his suburban high school. B'nai Brith and the GTA Faith Alliance told reporters last week they will hold a "citizen's inquest" June 12 into the killing, but they also urged the province to appoint an inquiry and a youth commissioner. Two 17-year-olds face first-degree murder charges. B'nai Brith joined the inquiry call to show that youth violence isn't limited to one group.

WORLD

Tenure Denial Urged

CHICAGO — A pro-Israel student group has delivered an 8,000-signature petition to DePaul University urging it to deny tenure to a controversial faculty member. Granting Norman Finkelstein tenure "would undermine those who support responsible and informed scholarship and debate," StandWithUs president Esther Rezner said in a statement. Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz has been prominent in the effort to deny tenure to Finkelstein, a child of Holocaust survivors who has been an assistant professor of political science at DePaul, a Catholic university in Chicago, since 2001. He has argued that Jewish groups "have exploited the Holocaust to enrich themselves or to justify Israeli politics." In April, his department and the school's personnel committee voted in favour of granting him tenure, while the administration voted against it. A final decision will be made this month.

Wartime Pope Helped Jews, Cardinal Says

Some say Pius didn't do enough, even accusing him of being anti-Semitic. But Cardinal Tarcisio Bertone, the Vatican's secretary of state, said Pius, who reigned from 1939 to 1958, tried unsuccessfully to save Jews by recruiting them for the Vatican security force.

Bertone made the comments last week at the unveiling of a new biography by Italian journalist Andrea Tornielli, who writes that charges about Pius and the Holocaust are part of a "black legend." He cites new documents from family archives that show Pius had close relations with a Jewish classmate in high school and that as Vatican secretary of state, he helped the boy's family escape to Switzerland.

Bertone said Pius decided not to speak out more forcefully against the Nazis because he felt it would only provoke them against Catholics and Jews, and acted "within the limits of circumstances imposed on him."

About 1,000 Roman Jews were killed in Auschwitz.

Historians and the Anti-Defamation League have called on the Vatican to declassify World War II-era documents to help settle concerns about Vatican actions during the Shoah.

Nazi Guard To Stay

NEW YORK — A former Nazi prison guard probably won't be deported from the United States because his health is rapidly declining. Andrew Kuras, 85, of Hamilton Township, N.J., is "gravely ill" and his "deportation is under review," a spokesperson for the Justice Department told Associated Press. In 2004, a federal judge stripped Kuras of his 1962 naturalization certificate and other citizenship documents. He worked at three Nazi slave-labour camps in World War II and ordered the shooting of anyone who tried to escape. He came to the United States in 1951 and became a citizen 11 years later.

Rabbi's Grave Defiled

WARSAW — The grave of a famed 19th-century chassidic rabbi in Lublin, Poland, was ransacked. Police said thieves stole the aluminum part of the tomb of Rabbi Yaakov Yitzchak Horowitz, the Seer of Lublin. Police are searching for the structure, which is used by pilgrims from around the world to place notes at the grave of the rabbi, who died in 1815.

Libby Sentenced

WASHINGTON — A U.S. federal judge last week sentenced Lewis "Scooter" Libby to 30 months in prison. Libby was sentenced for obstructing the investigation into who leaked the name of covert CIA operative Valerie Plame as part of a White House retaliation scheme against her husband, Joe Wilson, a prominent Iraq war critic. Libby, who is Jewish, was the top adviser to U.S. Vice-President Dick Cheney.

JAFI head praises quick Canadian response to Sderot shelling

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Zeev Bielski, chair of the executive of the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) and the World Zionist Organization (WZO), praised United Israel Appeal Federations Canada for being among the first to respond to an urgent appeal to help the children of Sderot, Israel, as Qassam rockets from Gaza rained down on them last month.

"In Sderot, I could see there was nothing I could do, so I called Canada," Bielski said at a luncheon during United Israel Appeal Federations Canada's (UIAFC) annual general meeting in Montreal. "That was the solution."

As a result of an influx of $2 million from Canada, he said, 8,200 children from Sderot, which borders on Gaza, will be able to spend one week in camps over the next two months, out of harm's way.

Others responding to JAFI's call for help have included United Jewish Communities (UJC), representing U.S. federations, and other federations around the world.

Bielski was named head of the Jewish Agency two years ago, after serving 16 years as mayor of Ra'anana, a city north of Tel Aviv.

At the luncheon, Bielski, who was born in 1949 in Jerusalem, was relaxed and affable as diners watched a brief JAFI video on the crisis in Sderot and listened to him describe the mood he witnessed there as Hamas rockets fell.

"It was almost too much," he said. "Your whole life there revolves around the 18 seconds it takes for the rockets to fall. It's like Russian roulette, and the children are paying the price.

"It's very sad," he said, since there does not appear to be a clear solution to the continuing bombardment by Hamas.

He said one of the priorities for the Jewish Agency now is to find suitable employment for the many Ethiopian Jews who are members of the professional classes.

"Lawyers and accountants can't find jobs," he lamented, but told an amusing anecdote about how he helped secure job interviews for Ethiopian candidates with the CEO of Bank Hapoalim. The CEO's receptionist was completely incredulous that her boss was interviewing immigrants for jobs, Bielski said.

Zeev Bielski

During the luncheon, Australia's Mark Leibler, chair of the Keren Hayesod-United Israel Appeal board of trustees – Keren Hayesod is a fundraising arm and, along with the WZO and the UJC, a constituent body of JAFI – cited the positive relationship between Keren Hayesod and UIAFC as something that must be preserved and enhanced as the Jewish fundraising world is determined to be more transparent and accountable in its work and processes.

Canada has been a model for those goals, Leibler said. In particular, he praised the fact that funding for JAFI has become part of UIAFC's "core" budget.

He said UIAFC has delivered a complex and sophisticated model for fundraising that serves as an example for the rest of the world.

Leibler praised three Canadians in particular for their activities in Keren Hayesod: the late Phil Granovsky of Toronto, its founding board of trustees chair; and Julia Koschitzky of Toronto and Harvey Wolfe of Montreal, who also held that position.

Leibler praised outgoing UIAFC president Stanley Plotnick, who is joining Keren Hayesod's world executive, for his "warmth, charm, good humour and clarity."

Plotnick, in his outgoing remarks as president, noted that over the last two years, UIAFC was obliged to work in the context of federation structures being redefined in an effort to eliminate "overlapping" of fundraising and advocacy activities.

"The lay and professional leadership… are the true heroes of Canadian Jewry," he said.

She has served as a Canada-Israel Committee executive board member and, for several years, as treasurer and vice-president for administration for UIAFC.

Leaders and responsibility

From the editor's desk

Very few pundits could find anything positive to write about Israel's decisive defeat of the five Arab armies it fought in the Six Day War 40 years ago.

That the victory prevented Israel's enemies from achieving their war aim, namely, destroying the Jewish state, somehow escaped most of the insightless commentary that filled newspapers and magazines last week.

One of the key motifs that emerged in the 40th-anniversary coverage was how the war was an additional chapter to the book of misery written by, for and about the Palestinians. The image that was painted was of a people displaced yet again, tolerated but not accepted amidst fellow Arabs, who cared not to ease Palestinian burdens but rather to also add to their suffering the condition of permanent statelessness. And of course, the Jews were responsible.

In the ensuing 40 years, two generations of Palestinians have grown into adulthood. But the decisions of their leaders – current and former – who purported to lead them, compel us to ask: why are they not, too, responsible for the Palestinian situation?

Why, after 1967, was Israel always blamed for Palestinian suffering? Why, since 1967, have Palestinian leaders – not to also mention the countless "host" Arab countries in which the Palestinians reside – escaped any sense of responsibility for the plight of their people?

What values have these leaders instilled after 40 years into their people? At what point along the long line of the past many years were Palestinian leaders expected to try to foster in their people values of mutual respect, tolerance and coexistence?

Last week's ledger alone of outrageous decisions by the Palestinian leaders is illustrative. It should be sufficient for enlightened, compassionate people around the globe to call them to account.

Palestinians trying to kill Israelis. Saturday, four Islamic Jihad gunmen breached the heavily fortified Gaza-Israel border at Kisufim, entered an empty army base looking for soldiers to abduct. Israeli forces engaged them, killing one. The other three escaped back to Gaza.

The attackers approached the border fence in an armoured jeep marked with "TV" and "PRESS" insignia. Thinking the vehicle was occupied by foreign press, the Israeli soldiers withheld fire.

The attempted abduction Saturday came almost a year after Hamas terrorists attacked an Israeli army base in the Negev, killed two soldiers and captured Cpl. Gilad Shalit on June 26.

As for Shalit, the president of the International Committee of the Red Cross, Jakob Kellenberger, on the weekend criticized the Hamas kidnappers and their leaders for refusing to divulge any information regarding his whereabouts.

But wait.

We learned on the weekend that it was not only the extremist Hamas group involved in Shalit's kidnapping. The Jerusalem Post revealed that two of the individuals suspected in Shalit's kidnapping, Muhammad Azmi Farawneh and Majdi Tayseer Hammad, had long been on the payroll of the mainstream, Fatah-run Palestinian Authority (PA). The two were killed by a subsequent Israeli retaliatory action, but their families have been receiving and lately quarrelling, too, over the special PA pension payments on behalf of their deceased terrorist kin.

Palestinians trying to kill other Palestinians.

Less than two days after a ceasefire went into effect in the southern town of Rafah, in the Gaza Strip, rival Fatah and Hamas began shooting at each other again. One member of Hamas' military wing and one member of the pro-Fatah National Security Forces were killed. Some 45 people, mostly civilians, were injured.

Dr. Muawiya Hassanein, head of emergency services in the Palestinian Health Ministry, told the New York Times that Hamas and Fatah had kidnapped and tortured rival members and that several Palestinians had been shot in the legs. At least 50 Palestinians, Hassanein said, were killed in fierce fighting in May between the factions, which share power in a unity government.

In the weekend intra-Palestinian violence, two people were thrown to their deaths from 15- and 12-storey roof tops. Early Monday morning Palestinian gunmen opened fire on the house of Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas. No one was hurt.

The chronicle of intra-Palestinian killing, extortion and torture continues unabated, even to this day.

The time is long overdue to hold Palestinians themselves and not the Israelis to account for the lawlessness of their society. Their leaders have taught, primarily, only hatred. And in a climate of constant hate, it is not surprising that tendrils will grow distorted.

By LAUREN KRAMER
Special to The CJN

VANCOUVER — The Vancouver Sun's so-called "Zionist line" came under attack last Thursday from a group identified as the Palestinian Media Collective.

According to the collective's new release, it distributed 12,000 copies of a fake edition of the Sun to morning commuters at transit hubs in Vancouver and Victoria. Its goal, the statement said, was to "point out the anti-Palestinian bias of the newspaper."

The bogus paper featured satirical articles and spoof ads of Chapters and Intel laced with the word "apartheid." The front-page cover image depicted an Arab man standing in the path of a bulldozer. The caption for it read: "Israeli military bulldozer brings the many gifts of civilization to a primitive resident of Nablus in the West Bank."

"We have provided a truth-telling antidote to the anti-Arab poison of the CanWest chain," said Palestine Media Collective spokesperson Earl Zatz Handel. "Our biggest challenge was writing parody articles that were more outrageous than CanWest's actual coverage."

The Sun is published by Pacific Newspaper Group, a division of CanWest MediaWorks. Friday's Vancouver Sun featured an article responding to the lookalike edition in which Sun publisher Kevin Bent said the group took "advantage of our brand" and that the paper may pursue legal action.

"We take these things very seriously," Bent said. "We'll go down the path of taking an appropriate amount of legal action."

He added that the Sun's coverage of the Israeli-Palestinian conflict has been fair.

"I think our job as a newspaper… is to be balanced, fair and accurate with our reporting. I think that's what we strive to do every day," he said. "I feel pretty good that our reporting on the Middle East is on the mark."

Canadian Jewish Congress Pacific region vice-chair Richard Kirland said that the protest is "a copyright issue. I'm waiting to see how the Vancouver Sun legal crew handles this."

He added: "The world will always be filled with people who feel the earth is flat. In this one, it's an individual who wants to create a legal issue with a Canadian newspaper, and that's their business. It's too trivial to even go there."

New RA head favours 'big tent' Conservatism

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi David Seed has just begun a two-year term as president of the Rabbinical Assembly's Ontario region at a time when some people think the Conservative movement is steadily moving toward the ideological left.

But the 50-year-old rabbi views with equanimity any potential local fallout from the announcement in late March by the Jewish Theological Seminary (JTS) – the Conservative movement's flagship institution in New York – that it would admit openly gay and lesbian students to its rabbinical and cantorial school.

Rabbi David Seed

Rabbi Wayne Allen – Rabbi Seed's predecessor as president of the organization – told The CJN at the time that he felt the decision was "an abandonment of traditional Judaism, and as such I can have no part of it."

Rabbi Seed, who is associate rabbi of Adath Israel Congregation, likewise describes himself as "traditional in terms of my outlook" with "an appreciation and respect for tradition."

Speaking for himself, not the RA, Rabbi Seed said in a recent interview that he does not agree with the JTS decision, "but at the same time… we're not saying [gays and lesbians are] somehow not a part of the Jewish community. Each of us is created in the image of God regardless of [his or her] sexual orientation."

The rabbi, who received a master's degree in social work a year after his 1983 ordination from JTS, said he grew up in the Conservative movement.

"While I might not agree with all the decisions, I think the movement has a particular and important role to play in the Jewish community at large for all Jews," he said.

"As long as people on both sides see that there is respect for each other, then I think there will be a role to play, regardless of which end of the model you happen to subscribe to."

He said he has not seen any indication from JTS' chancellor-elect Arnold Eisen that the "big tent" pluralistic model of Conservative Judaism is about to change.

Rabbi Seed also said that affiliated congregations in Toronto are not as homogenous as they're sometimes made out to be.

"There are many variations amongst congregations here," he said. "I think some of our differences mirror some of the differences we may find throughout the movement as a whole. There are some congregations where women will have an aliyah and read the Torah, and others where they will not."

Full egalitarianism, however – where women are accorded the same ritual honours as men including being counted in a minyan – is the exception rather than the rule in the Toronto area, with only two egalitarian congregations in the GTA: Beit Rayim Synagogue, and the smaller, newer B'nai Shalom Congregation of Halton Peel, which has about 20 families.

Rabbi Seed expects much of his work as president of the RA's Ontario region will involve routine administrative duties as well as interaction with other community organizations.

The RA offers a basic Judaism course for prospective converts and runs a school for shamashim. One aspect of his role, he said, is "being a cheerleader for all the good programs and things that we do."

As well, he said, he is hoping to "move forward" the plans for a Conservative mikvah in Toronto. Currently, Conservative rabbis use the Reform mikvah at Leo Baeck Day School in Thornhill.

Notwithstanding his gratitude to the Reform community, "we do think it's a reflection on our movement to be able to have our own mikvah as well," he said. "It's a need that only grows from year to year."

As part of an international organization comprising approximately 1,500 members, Rabbi Seed will also interact with counterparts in other regions on issues such as the standardization of conversion under Conservative auspices.

He also serves on the RA's resolution committee, which prepares resolutions on issues such as support for the State of Israel, and is involved in a seminar for rabbis on "Rabbinic Power and Tikkun Olam" being held in Toronto this October. It will be the first of six such seminars being held by the RA in South America, the United States, Israel and England.

Same-sex commitment ceremonies have not appeared on the RA's agenda here, and to the best of his knowledge, he said, none of the approximately 30 Conservative rabbis in the region, which includes Montreal, have been approached to perform such a ceremony.

"We have a common understanding in terms of the type of ceremonies we will officiate at," he said.

In addition to the movement's ban on officiating at interfaith weddings, Rabbi Seed noted that "on a regional level, we will not officiate at a ceremony for a wedding where the meal afterward will not be kosher. This is a regional standard we have, because we believe strongly that the meal afterward should be in keeping with the ceremony in terms of it being a seudat mitzvah that is in keeping with the religious ceremony."

Brosh gives Six Day War history lesson

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It's been 40 years since Israel's stunning victory during the Six Day War and the reunification of Jerusalem, and Petah Tikvah Congregation in Toronto was one of the many organizations that celebrated the milestone.

About 200 people gathered June 6 to hear Ya'acov Brosh, Israel's consul general in Toronto, speak about Israel's famous battle with Egypt, Syria and Jordan.

Brosh took the gathering back to a time when Israel was surrounded by hostile Arab neighbours who were determined to wipe it off the map.

He described how then-Egyptian president Gamal Abdel Nasser openly prepared for war and influenced neighbouring countries to join the fight to destroy the Jewish state.

Prior to the war, Nasser expelled the United Nations Emergency Force from the Sinai Peninsula, blockaded the Straits of Tiran to Israeli ships and had troops stationed in Sinai near the Israeli border. Syrian troops were also preparing for battle near the Golan Heights.

Israelis feared the prospect of going to war with an enemy that outnumbered them by the hundreds of thousands, but they knew their best chance to win the war would be to launch a pre-emptive strike on the Egyptian air force.

In just one day, Israel destroyed nearly the entire Egyptian and Jordanian air forces, and half of the Syrian air force.

Six days later, on June 10, the war was over, Israel was victorious and had captured Sinai, the Golan Heights, the Gaza Strip and the West Bank, tripling its land mass.

"When we think about the unbelievable results of this war, we shouldn't forget that there were many heavy battles where many soldiers lost their lives," Brosh said.

"After the 1967 war, Israel offered to give back most of the territories for real peace. The Arabs said no. Most of them keep saying no until today."

He read from an announcement that was published by Hamas last week to illustrate that the rhetoric against Israel has not changed since the war.

It outlined Hamas' objective to rid the world of the State of Israel and liberate it from Jewish rule.

While the desire of Israel's enemies to see the destruction of the State has remained constant, the negative media bias against Israel has become more pronounced, he said.

"If this would have happened today, the media would have said it was an unnecessary war," he said, referring to the popular view that last summer's war with Hezbollah was unnecessary.

"We are willing to give on some of our historical monuments. We are willing to help to establish, for the first time, a Palestinian state."

But, he said, if it will be a state built on the foundation of producing more terrorists with the intent to destroy Israel, the Palestinians will achieve nothing.

"They will suffer so much more if they choose to continue this way. If they choose peace, they will find us willing to have peace with them, and we will strive for a better future for all of us."

An ever larger, looming menace

One of the most surprising, yet interesting, developments to emerge from the recently concluded G-8 summit meetings in Germany was the suggestion by Russian President Vladimir Putin that a missile defence system be deployed in Azerbaijan in order to counter a possible launch of long-range Iranian missiles. The suggestion was intended to stand in lieu of an American plan to place the anti-Iranian defensive shield in Eastern Europe.

But it was significant for a number of reasons, foremost of which, perhaps, was that it was evidence, finally, that the Russians also understand and are starting to worry about the grave, far-reaching, global harm posed by Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Putin should be worried by the Iranian regime, as should all of the G-8 leaders.

Last month, the United Nations' International Atomic Energy Agency inspectors conducted a surprise visit to the Iranian reactor located in Natanz and found some 1,600 centrifuges for the advanced enrichment of high-grade uranium. A report last week updated the estimated number of working centrifuges at 2,000.

The revelations by the IAEA inspection team preceded by a few days the shocking but robustly iterated threat by Ahmadinejad that "the countdown button for the destruction of the Zionist regime has been pushed by the hands of the children of Lebanon and Palestine."

The expressions of offence and outrage at this latest anti-Israel salvo by Ahmadinejad were immediate.

"Such remarks are incompatible with the dialogue between cultures and civilizations to which we are committed, and with Iran's aspiration to play a regional role of primary importance," said Bernard Kouchner, the French foreign minister.

"Iran has yet again defied the request of the international community embodied in the second UN Security Council resolution, and that raises the prospect of a third resolution in order to increase pressure on Iran and get it to understand that the international community is serious that it needs to suspend its enrichment program," said Stephen Hadley, national security adviser to U.S. President George W. Bush.

On Sunday, Iran's deputy interior minister on security, Mohammed Bager Zolghadr, reportedly threatened to send oil prices to $250 (US) a barrel, block the Strait of Hormuz to oil exports from the Gulf and attack both American and Israeli interests throughout the world. The rulers of Iran boast about their missiles even as they secretly develop the nuclear warheads that those missiles are intended to deliver.

If a third sanctions resolution against Iran does materialize at the Security Council, we urge Canada to support it and help drive the point home that the menace looms larger by the day.

Objecting to Canadian prime minister Pierre Trudeau's description of Israel's invasion of Lebanon as an act of aggression, Canadian Jewish Congress president Irwin Cotler called the invasion a necessary act of self defence, in accordance with international law. The Canada-Israel Committee echoed Cotler's opinion, saying it was "dismayed" by Trudeau's words.

Qassams are professionally manufactured

The headline "Sderot residents cope with attacks" (CJN, June 8) does not do justice to the article, which describes the unbearable conditions under which Sderot's residents live today. More than half of Sderot's 24,000 residents have left the city, and many others would leave if they had a place to which they could escape.

It is not accurate to minimize the threat by calling the Qassam rockets "homemade." This may have been the case years ago, but today's Qassams are professionally manufactured by Hezbollah and Iran-trained Hamas gunmen, using military-grade explosives, which – according to Israel Defence Forces intelligence briefings – have been flooding into Gaza from Egypt. Last year an estimated 35 tonnes were smuggled across the border.

All of this is the predicted result of Israel's abandonment of the Gaza Strip and putting the safety of western Negev residents into the hands of Egyptian and European observers, who turn a blind eye to the smuggling.

Meanwhile, instead of allowing the IDF to use its full capabilities to eliminate the threat, the government of Israel makes do with plans to "reinforce" classrooms. And even this, only after being forced to do so by a Supreme Court ruling. According to the government's own estimates, the reinforcing work won't be carried out for many months.

Response to Brown (1)

Michael Brown's guest voice, "The assisted suicide of CJC: does it matter? (CJN, June 7) was an overly critical and misinformed opinion piece.

I have been involved with Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, for more than five years and an officer for several years. I have had the opportunity to see the new bylaw being discussed at a meeting in which we came to the conclusion that the status quo governing procedure was overly burdensome and not working in the best interests of our community.

Brown's comments that the democratic base was being battered is not accurate. Regional elections remain fully intact, and, in fact, under the new bylaw, CJC regions across the country are strengthened as a result.

Michael Marmur

"The assisted suicide of CJC: does it matter?" (CJN, June 7) is an unfair attack on our most important Jewish voice. I have spent many years volunteering my time for Canadian Jewish Congress as an officer of Ontario region and on many committees.

Streamlining an antiquated governance structure is a welcome development. While there is room for disagreement about how a large organization with a time-honoured history should be governed, the relevant question is whether the new structure will better enable CJC to fulfil its mandate. I believe that CJC's volunteer and professional leaders will effectively advocate on the important issues affecting our community even better than in years past.

Thanks for supporting Israel

In your paper, you published an ad in which members of Parliament and senators from all parties acknowledged that in the reunited Jerusalem each religion has control of its own holy sites and the freedom of access and worship (CJN, May 10).

Our community has always been quick to criticize whenever an anti-Israel stand is taken. Now is the time to praise the leaders who lent their names to the ad. I, for one, commend them on this remarkable show of support.

Elie/Candel/Lebovich family reunion

The Elie, Candel and Lebovich families from Podu Iloaiei, in the Romanian province of Moldavia (near Iasi), began arriving in Canada in 1907 and settled in Toronto, Hamilton, Detroit, Boston and Rochester.

The next generation grew to include the following families: Ely/Elias, Richter, Tishler, Rubin, Pazner, Lipchitz, Appel, Moses, Weingarten, Cohen, Philips, Isenberg, Lebow, Sternberg, Taubman and Goldstein.

A reunion is being planned for sometime in August to celebrate the family's 100th year in North America. We would like to invite all descendants of the original families.

Response to U.K. boycott threat

By BEN HARRIS
JTA

Jews around the world were united last week in denouncing a major British trade union's decision to consider a boycott of Israeli universities, but they differed over how to respond to such threats.

Some want to fight fire with fire, while others are opting for an appeal

On the more combative side are figures like Harvard University professor Alan Dershowitz, who is reportedly advocating for legislation that would "devastate and bankrupt" British universities that refuse to do business with their Israeli counterparts.

On the other side are groups such as the Anti-Defamation League, which for now prefers to keep the controversy in the rhetorical realm by publishing a number of ads in major international newspapers branding the proposed boycott an act of anti-Semitism.

The differences emerged after the University and College Union (UCU), Britain's largest teachers union, ignored the warnings of its secretary general and voted May 30 to consider an academic boycott of Israeli universities.

Though most observers say the effort is likely to fail when put before the union's full membership – four previous British attempts at an academic boycott of Israel have faltered – it nevertheless appears to have inspired other British bodies to consider similar measures.

Almost immediately after the UCU move, the country's largest trade union decided to consider a boycott motion at its upcoming conference. While the UCU represents 120,000 members, UNISON has more than a million.

Ex-Briton David Newman, a political science professor at Ben-Gurion University (BGU) who was a visiting professor at the University of Bristol during the past academic year, was the only Israeli professor to address the UCU before its May 30 vote. He said the dangerous effect of the decision is the ripple effect it could have among more "serious unions," such as UNISON.

"This isn't an isolated event. It is the tip of the iceberg. There are other unions that see this as a precedent, and I think there is a whole atmosphere of 'Let's boycott Israel.'"

Both the UCU and UNISON decisions follow a resolution in April by Britain's National Union of Journalists condemning Israel's "savage" attack last summer on Lebanon and calling for sanctions against the Jewish state.

With the boycott movement appearing to gain momentum, Jewish organizational officials are at odds over how to react.

There is the oft-cited hope that cooler heads will prevail in the face of an initiative most Jews consider flagrantly discriminatory, if not abjectly anti-Semitic.

In Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress CEO Bernie Farber says it's important to keep the British unions' actions in perspective.

"The same thing happened a year ago and it was rejected, and of course the hope is that it will be rejected once again," he said, referring to UNISON's vote to consider a boycott motion.

Farber said CJC is working with trade unionists, both Jewish and non-Jewish, who support Israel in order to create a "counterbalance" to the possible boycott.

As for concrete action plans, he said Congress is keeping an eye on the situation and waiting to hear what its British sister organization, the British Board of Jewish Deputies, believes should be done in North America.

Peter Willner, executive vice-president of the American Friends of Hebrew University, the American fundraising arm of the Jerusalem institution, told JTA his organization opposes boycotts in principle and would confine its response to issuing a news release and raising awareness in the academic community.

"The only way to stop all of this is to have the right people stand up and say, 'We're not going to stand for this,'" Willner said. "I think boycotts are an illegitimate tool, and especially when used against the State of Israel."

In its own press release, Hillel, the world's largest Jewish campus organization, said that the UCU's "anti-intellectual action undermines the very definition of academic freedom and strikes at the root of the scholarly enterprise," and it urged UCU members "to tear down obstacles to the free and comprehensive exchange of ideas, not to erect them. Academic freedom is essential to promoting tolerance and peace."

Similar efforts to isolate Israel have taken root among trade unions in Canada, South Africa and Ireland. In the United States, sporadic efforts to have universities divest from Israel have been unsuccessful.

Only in Britain has the boycott effort been endorsed by unions of university teachers and journalists – both groups, critics are quick to point out, that profess fidelity to ideals of impartiality and dispassion.

Newman, of BGU, said serious academics see this motion as an "annoyance" and some professors have given up their UCU memberships as a result.

"It really does puzzle me," Prof. Malcolm Grant, president of University College London and head of the Russell Group, a coalition of Britain's 20 largest research universities, said of the atmosphere in the United Kingdom.

The coalition issued a statement calling the UCU vote "a contradiction in terms and in direct conflict with the mission of a university." It echoed remarks by British Prime Minister Tony Blair, who told Parliament last week that a boycott is "misguided" and a threat to academic freedom.

"Anti-Zionism appears to have taken on a sharper edge in Britain because of a historic and persistent hard-left movement," said Jon Benjamin, chief executive of the Board of Deputies of British Jews. Many of the rank-and-file members of the UCU routinely take their cue from them, he said.

The hard left, however, is active well beyond Britain, including on university campuses in the United States. For some, the difference lies in the response of the public as much as in the efforts of boycott supporters.

Newman said it's a positive sign that much of the world has reacted negatively to the UCU motion.

"It is worth noting just how comprehensive the reaction to it has been, even from sources where you would not normally expect them to be pro-Israel," he said.

"And they're not responding because they are pro-Israel, they're responding because they think a boycott is totally the wrong thing to do. It's discriminatory, it's exclusionary, it's all these things that these people claim they defend."

He said Israeli universities should foster collaboration between Israeli and British academics, in order to show that it's mainly radical activists who support a boycott, not serious academics.

"The worst thing is when Israelis turn around and say, 'We're not going to go to Britain anymore,' because they are self-implementing the boycott more successfully than [the unions]."

In Canada, he recommends that people take an anti-boycott stand, and show that it's possible be pro-Palestinian without favouring a boycott.

Ms. Sally Hunt
General Secretary
Association of University Teachers
Egmont House, 25-31 Tavistock Place
London WC1H 9UT
United Kingdom

Dear Ms. Hunt:

I write to you with a heavy heart, as it is not often that I contemplate endorsing a boycott against fellow academics who are themselves innocent of all wrongdoing. However, the actions of your country, and the lessons I have learned from the British University and College Union (UCU), leave me with little choice.

This week the UCU recommended a boycott of all Israeli academic institutions, based on its opposition to Israel's occupation of Palestinian lands and its alleged violation of various UN resolutions and the Fourth Geneva Convention. I do not think that the UCU has accurately analyzed Israel's actions, but I gather that debate is now over and the UCU resolution recommending a boycott is in place.

Although I do not agree with it, it is incumbent on academics in the rest of the world to take the UCU's statement of principle seriously. I therefore feel obliged to point out that it is the United Kingdom that has invaded and occupied another country's territory for no reason of self-defence or any other legally recognized imperative. Whatever one might say about Israel's actions in the occupied territories, its 1967 capture of the West Bank and Gaza was in response to threatened annihilation. The 2003 British invasion of Iraq was in response to no similar threat posed by the Iraqis to the U.K.

Indeed, as you must be aware, the British invasion of Iraq in 2003 was unauthorized by the United Nations. As a result, more than a dozen prominent British international law academics have opined in the Guardian that this military venture, and the prolonged occupation pursuant thereto, is contrary to all applicable international legal norms.

Accordingly, under the UCU's governing principles an academic boycott of British universities is called for. Speaking personally, I do not endorse the notion of a nationality-based boycott of this kind, as I believe such actions unfairly target innocent persons who have nothing to do with formulating or carrying out government policy, and, in addition, they curtail free speech and free academic debate. I am certain, for example, that you do not feel personally responsible for the actions of Prime Minister [Tony] Blair and his government's forces in Iraq.

Nevertheless, the UCU principle dictates that the world pronounce you and all of your British colleagues guilty, and that we engage in an international boycott of every academic in your country until its government changes its ways. I know this sounds unfair, but it is what the UCU effectively demands.

Yours truly,

Ed Morgan,
Faculty of Law, University of Toronto,
Outgoing President,

Let not prejudice blind us

There is an awkward symmetry between Jewish prejudices against Poles and Polish prejudices against Jews. Jews tend to accuse Poles of perennial anti-Semitism. Poles often believe that Jews are forever imbued with what they call anti-Polonialism.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

When either side finds evidence to the contrary, it makes exceptions for the case in hand, but tends to refuse to modify its overall stance.

The overwhelming majority of Poles are Roman Catholics, but their prejudices are not necessarily motivated by religion. As reported last month in The CJN, Romuald Jakub Weksler-Waszkinel is a Polish Catholic priest who at age 35 discovered that he is a Jew by birth and, remaining a faithful servant of his church, is now promoting Christian-Jewish understanding.

But when this staunch Catholic addressed fellow Polish Catholics in Mississauga during his recent visit to Canada, many comments from the floor had strong anti-Semitic overtones. Though there were no expressions of disdain for Poland when he spoke to a mixed audience in Toronto, only relatively few Jews attended.

By contrast, it seems that, unlike Diaspora Jews who carry the unhappy memories of Poland of their parents and grandparents, Israelis, secure in their country, are often more open to the new Poland. One of Israel's former ambassadors in Warsaw, Shevach Weiss, epitomized this, and he did much to break down barriers.

The Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada, whose guest Father Weksler-Waszkinel was, is trying to do the same here.

It will be marking its 20th anniversary next year. Its aim is to break down the fearful symmetry of prejudice by exposing Poles and Jews alike to the more complex truths that don't ignore the past, yet point to many pro-Jewish sentiments and actions in contemporary Polish society and a growing understanding for things Polish among discerning Jews everywhere.

It is an uphill battle, for each side is prone to accuse the other of intransigence. Because both Jews and Poles have been the victims of Nazism and Communism, they find it almost impossible to recognize the scars of the other. Instead, they often accuse the other of having inflicted their pain.

This is an appeal to Jewish readers to recognize the complexity of the situation and learn to distinguish between friend and foe. For example, you may wish to note that, among European nations, Poland, together with Germany, is today the staunchest supporter of Israel. Israelis celebrate it. You may also wish to know of the many books and films on Jewish themes that are being published in Poland, and the numerous Polish scholars and artists who seek to disseminate accurate and sympathetic knowledge about Judaism.

Holding on to old and irrelevant prejudices makes us blind. The time has come to open our eyes.

Beyond summer camp

To go to summer camp or not to go to summer camp? This is the perennial question plaguing many Jewish teens or 20-somethings each spring. Should one slave away in a meaningless job in the city or escape to the lakeside beauty of camp? Enjoy patios and air-conditioning or bunk beds and gossiping?

I can comfortably say that my answer in years past was never in question, but this year, roasted marshmallows and sing-alongs around bonfires is not where my heart is. And while it feels strange to move beyond summer camp, it is part of the process of growing up.

Every summer since I was eight, I have left the loving care of my parents' house for the dirty confines of the wooden cabins of Camp Shomria.

Affiliated with Hashomer Hatzair, a progressive Zionist youth movement, camp quickly became a second home for me. Becoming acclimatized to the camp atmosphere was easy because my older siblings were veteran campers. I grew up with Hashomer's informal educational model of youth leading youth towards individual and collective actualization.

In exposing me to communal living and progressive thinking, Hashomer Hatzair taught me to question the world around me. Camp Shomria provided me with memorable summers, lasting friendships and a respite in nature, all of which allowed me to become the person I am today.

Jonah Brotman in Ottawa

As a veteran counsellor, I have given years of support to the movement. I have educated countless campers about almost every topic imaginable.

The cyclical nature of being a camper who is taught to be a counsellor who teaches came full circle this past year, with a year-long leadership training program that culminated for many in the program in a month-long trip to Israel during the Lebanon Crisis. The Yedid program taught these young adults how to be counsellors, just as I was taught some years ago. I knew it would be a fitting end to my camp career.

But how does one know when enough is enough? Could I not return for one more summer? This question haunted me all year. At my age, I could provide essential experience and leadership support to a younger group of counsellors.

With the average counsellor still in high school, my university and general knowledge would be incredibly valuable. On the other hand, the disconnect between the high school lifestyle and my mindset as a recent university grad is an immeasurable chasm.

I write this column on the archaic computers of Biznet Internet Café, which is found in Bolgatanga, Ghana. Biznet describes itself as the only high-speed café in town, a loose term around these parts for anything beyond a snail's crawl. Any avid CJN reader would remember my previous column, which spoke about my current development trip for university students to northern Ghana, where we are building an orphanage.

The trip has been an overwhelming success so far, with all participants truly gaining a deeper understanding of the challenges facing development projects. For example, in laying foundations for the orphanage dormitory we are constructing, the local contractors lined up wooden markers by pointing their arms in a line and eyeing out the measurements. Quite a difference from mechanized levellers and tape-measured lengths in Canadian construction.

But these are the realities of Africa.

Leading this trip to Ghana has shown me that my life is moving beyond summer camp. Organizing university students to support projects in the developing world has become my passion. I intend to continue my work with these children for many more years. But I have also learned that camp will always be a part of me. Running serious discussions about debt reduction, poverty and HIV/AIDS during this trip is actually similar to activities I previously ran with my campers.

So what will I miss most about camp? I guess I will find out when I return home to Toronto for the summer. But for now, as I wait for what seems like an eternity to submit this column, I cannot help but remember the lyrics of the camp song I wrote some years ago.

It goes: "I wish I could stay for life, the rest of my life. But when I have to leave you, I know you'll be fine."

Camp will be fine, and so will I.

Back to the woods

Every year, I say I won't go back. And yet, for some reason, when June rolls around, I find myself packing my bags and heading for the Northwoods of Wisconsin, where I have worked at Camp Ramah for the past four summers.

With most of my school friends spending their summers working for law firms or travelling the world, I get a bit of flak for spending mine tucked away from civilization, working with kids.

No one is more surprised than me that I keep returning to camp. Having resisted all attempts by my parents to send me to camp as a child, I would never describe myself as a camp person. It was purely for lack of other options that I accepted a job in the summer of 2003 at Ramah Wisconsin, where my older sister had already spent two summers.

Mordechai Walfish in Halifax

Upon arriving at camp, I immediately regretted my decision. While the other counsellors had six years of memories to fall back on, I was the newcomer and, therefore, the outsider. Camp was a second home to them, while for me it was a strange place.

I was annoyed by the lack of personal space and the fact that I was no longer in charge of my daily schedule and what I could eat. These feelings remained unabated for the first few weeks at camp, while I prayed daily that I would come down with mononucleosis or some other ailment that's serious enough to allow me to leave but would clear up in a few months.

But then, almost magically, I began to connect with my 14-year-old campers, and all of my previous annoyances with camp faded into the background. I quickly realized that camp provides an unparalleled opportunity to create community with youths who would likely remain strangers, or acquaintances at best, during the year.

The primary reason that I keep returning to camp is that it provides such an effective and interesting complement to everyday life. Compared to camp, everyday life is rather unco-ordinated, with far more emphasis on individual pursuits. At camp, it's impossible to undertake any self-contained task. Any decision – large or small – has an effect on others, and there's no place where you can truly escape others and be alone.

While the bubble of camp can be overwhelming, it also makes it possible to have the conversations with others that you would not take the time for during the year. At camp, there is no such thing as rushing off to one's personal activities and attempting to grow in isolation from others.

This is, of course, what makes camp unsustainable as a permanent concept. We all need the space to grow and figure things out on our own that the rest of the year provides. Camp allows you to return every year to a familiar place with the skills, knowledge, and talents you have cultivated throughout the past year. It lets you measure how much you have grown over the year and display and develop your new self in a comfortable setting.

While camp itself can't be permanent, it's safe to say that for hundreds of campers throughout the world, the ideas and memories from camp sustain them throughout the year. I see this from campers I am in touch with during the year and from speaking to youth in Halifax who can barely wait another moment to return to their beloved Camp Kadimah.

I find that camp especially sustains children who live in small Jewish communities. At my camp, most campers come from Chicago or Minneapolis, but there are quite a few who make the trek from Oklahoma, Nebraska, Iowa and other relatively isolated locations. Coming to camp each summer lets these campers experience the possibilities for Jewish communal life that exist and to use them as a model in their own communities.

I've also found that campers from large Jewish communities learn a lot from their counterparts in smaller ones. Often, those in smaller places take more ownership over their Jewish life, because they know that without their initiative, the community would not survive.

Camp allows for the creation and sustaining of a non-geographical community. I'm not sure how much longer I will keep returning to camp, but I am certain that the community will exist for me long after my final stay there.

The Kirshner File

Saudi peace proposals are still on the table

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Nearly three months after Saudi Arabia's peace initiative was revived and unanimously endorsed at an Arab League summit in Riyadh, the Arab-Israeli peace process remains frozen in amber.

First unveiled five years ago, the plan was presented yet again on the basis of the same broad principles – Arab recognition of and peace and normalization with Israel in exchange for an Israeli withdrawal to the 1967 lines, the establishment of a Palestinian state with east Jerusalem as its capital and an "agreed, just solution" of the Palestinian refugee problem.

Then, as now, the plan was plagued by poor timing, having been launched in an atmosphere pervaded by violence and pessimism, hardly a situation conducive to good will, let alone peacemaking.

In March 2002, when it was originally introduced, the second Palestinian uprising was in full swing, boiling over with Palestinian suicide bombings and roadside shootings and Israeli retaliatory strikes. These developments prompted Israel to reoccupy the West Bank in Operation Defensive Shield and signalled the last gasp of the Oslo peace process.

Five years on, the intifadah has reached a low ebb in terms of violent incidents, but the Palestinian electorate in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip has turned back the clock, having elected an Islamic fundamentalist government that wilfully ignores reality. Hamas, which has been in power for the past 15 months, refuses to recognize Israel and renounce terrorism, notwithstanding efforts by its junior coalition partner, Fatah, to moderate its rejectionist views. True, Hamas has accepted agreements signed by Israel and the Palestinian Authority since 1994, but only grudgingly and obliquely.

Since the 2006 election, Hamas has tolerated attacks on Israel by Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, an offshoot of Fatah. In recent weeks, Hamas has massively violated a shaky six-month-old truce with Israel, firing scores of Qassam rockets at Israeli settlements, especially the town of Sderot, and thereby renewed its hot war with Israel.

The on-again, off-again fratricidal street battles pitting Hamas against Fatah, which have claimed the lives of almost 200 Palestinians since last year and which Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas has described as verging on civil war, have exacerbated tensions. As long as the Palestinians are mired in deep internal disputes over policy toward Israel and power-sharing arrangements, and as long as Hamas exploits the strife to attack the Jewish state, Israel will be hard-pressed to consider the two-headed Palestinian Authority as a serious negotiating partner.

Saudi Arabia– a Sunni redoubt and a U.S. ally– relaunched its ambitious peace plan against the backdrop of these bitter realities and its concern that the Arab-Israeli dispute and Iranian radicalism are among the chief causes of instability in the Middle East.The Saudis seem convinced that if Israel's conflict with the Arabs, particularly the Palestinians, can be settled by political means, Iran's growing influence as a Shiite power can be whittled down and contained. From this perspective, there may be a confluence of interests between Saudi Arabia and Israel.

In a recent op-ed piece in the New York Times, Fuad Siniora, the prime minister of Lebanon, suggested that the Saudi proposal is genuine and that military force is no panacea for Israel. "The Arab states are not seeking to wipe Israel off the map," he wrote. "Rather, we are seeking the legitimate goals of an armistice, secure borders and the ability of all of the region's people to live in peace and security." In an allusion to last summer's war in Lebanon, he added that "compromise and diplomacy" are the only answers to instability.

Jordan, the second Arab country after Egypt to sign a formal peace treaty with Israel, delivered a similar message recently when King Abdullah II told an Israeli delegation in Amman that Israel should embrace the Saudi initiative. As he put it, "Israel must adopt [it] as a foundation for negotiations, and musn't miss this opportunity to be recognized by all the area states, and truly become part of the region."

Israel's response has been tepid, though not as categorically negative as in 2002, when it flatly rejected the Saudi plan.

In a series of comments, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert has heaped praise on it while not actually accepting it. He has talked about its "positive elements" and regards it as "a basis for discussions with the Palestinians." And while he is prepared to discuss the plan with Arab leaders without preconditions, he has said that he will not accept ultimatums. Israel's foreign minister, Tzipi Livni, has been relatively upbeat, too, saying that the plan's advocacy of a two-state solution converges with Israel's interests in preserving itself as a democratic Jewish state.

Ehud Olmert

Israel has not fully embraced the plan for two reasons. It opposes a return to the pre-1967 borders, hoping to retain major settlement blocs in the West Bank. Olmert has said that Israel wants to keep about 10 per cent of the West Bank, a position at odds with Arab and Palestinian policy. Olmert also opposes the repatriation of Palestinian refugees, having declared that Israel will never allow a single refugee to return to what is now Israel.

King Abdullah II

Despite its reservations, Israel has neither rejected the plan altogether nor broken off talks with the Arabs. The Saudi proposals, therefore, remain in play.

Shortly after the Riyadh summit ended, the Arab League appointed a special team, consisting of the Egyptian and Jordanian foreign ministers, to advance the plan. The Israeli government was disappointed that Arab League members that still have not recognized Israel were not appointed to the delegation. Nonetheless, Israel has agreed to cooperate, and in this spirit, Livni has visited Amman and Cairo.

Last week, she invited the Arab League representatives – Ahmed Aboul Gheit of Egypt and Abdelelah al-Khatib of Jordan – for talks in Israel. In previous discussions, Livni told them that the plan is no substitute for direct negotiations with the Palestinians, and urged them to exert pressure on the Palestinian side to cease all acts of terrorism.

In accordance with the 2003 "road map" peace plan, sponsored by the United States, the European Union, Russia and the United Nations, Israel is demanding that the Palestinians dismantle the infrastructure of terrorism in the territories. In this respect, the Palestinians have not fulfilled their obligations. Yet Israel has not abided by the rules of the road map either, having expanded settlements and tolerated the construction of unauthorized outposts in the West Bank.

Olmert was supposed to have met Abbas last week to discuss these and other issues in an attempt to ease tensions, but their meeting was postponed, and a new date was not set. Generally, the Palestinians want to tackle permanent status issues such as final borders and Jewish settlements. Outgoing Israeli Defence Minister Amir Peretz agrees with this strategy. Olmert has voiced optimism that a comprehensive peace agreement is attainable within the next five years, but he currently prefers to focus on secondary problems, from the easing of security restrictions on the Palestinians to the shelling of Israeli settlements near Gaza.

On this pivotal issue, U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice has essentially sided with Israel. Having concluded that a comprehensive accord is not presently in the cards, she wants Israel and the Palestinian Authority to adopt a series of interim "benchmarks."

But even these modest goals seem unattainable. Israel and the Palestinians are fighting rather than talking. And that is tragic.

Toronto among the top centres for Jewish education, says expert

Rabbi Josh Elkin cites city for strong commitment

By HOWARD ENGLISH
UJA FEDERATION

When it comes to Jewish education enrolment, Toronto is a North American leader, according to a noted Jewish education specialist.

In the following comprehensive interview with Jewish Toronto, Rabbi Josh Elkin, executive director of the Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE), reviewed a wide range of Jewish education issues. PEJE is a collaborative initiative of schools and major philanthropic partners designed to strengthen Jewish day school education in North America.

Rabbi Josh Elkin

Q. Even though the niche of PEJE is day school education, it's a reality that many parents are opting for other forms of Jewish education – both formal and informal. How do you feel about that?

A. I'm a big believer that we have to have all the settings for Jewish education being the best that they can possibly be. In the global sense, I want them to be successful. We have to keep as many people as possible connected to their roots. The trend that I see is people coming forward to improve every part of the Jewish education equation. I applaud all these efforts even as I affirm PEJE's niche, which is day schools. I am very happy with a marketplace that is improving on all fronts.

Q. How would you describe the evolution of day schools across North America in the 10 years since PEJE was founded?

A. When we started 10 years ago, we were focused exclusively on seed funds and expertise for new schools. During our initial five years, we provided seed money and coaching to 60 schools, including Heschel in Toronto and the Paul Penna Day School. We've certainly seen the proliferation of schools and we've brought schools to many cities or regions that didn't have them. Over the last decade, we've seen the subject of day schools becoming more front and centre in communities across North America.

Q. How does Toronto's Jewish school enrollment of roughly 11,000 day school students and 6,000 children in supplementary education compare with other North American cities?

A. The proportion of Toronto children enrolled in day school is at the top of North America. The United States was busy at the beginning of the 20th century, cultivating a melting pot philosophy. As a result of that ethos, the day school movement got off to a slow start. Canada never had that philosophy. It was more of a cultural mosaic. In Canada, sending children to Jewish schools was what parents did.

Q. Yet for many parents, Jewish schooling is not an option. Why do you think that's the case?

A. Among the challenges that we have is to tackle perceptions that day schools are 'ghettoizing' and they are of inferior quality. Based on everything we read, the issue of 'ghettoization' and ambivalence about Judaism comes up more often than not. We have to focus on adult learning. We have to focus on pre-school programs. We have to help people fall in love with Judaism. The irony is that sometimes people of other faiths are more ready to make a strong case for faith-based education than we are.

Q. Let's discuss the question of Jewish school quality. What is your assessment of the quality of Jewish education overall?

A. Based on all the data we have, the day schools are doing an outstanding job. The overall picture is a very positive one, but we have to be able to recognize that, in an increasingly competitive world, the only way schools can go is to sharpen their blades when it comes to education quality. If you were to ask me what is the most important characteristic that day schools need to cultivate, I would say it's the ability to reflect on their own performance.

Q. Any final thoughts on the state of Jewish education in North America?

A. Epi [Dr. Seymour Epstein, UJA Federation senior vice president, Jewish Education & Identity] once said that Jewish education is the strategic plan of the Jewish people. If it hadn't been for Jewish education, we wouldn't be here today. The kind of community support for Jewish education demonstrated by Toronto shows that the Toronto Jewish community understands the future and the road to the future.

Toronto wins top prize for Israeli partnership

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG

Toronto's partnership with Eilat-Eilot has borne much fruit by beginning the transformation of the area from a totally tourist based economy to a centre for post-secondary education. Now Toronto has received first-prize laurels for its internship program at a Partnership 2000 conference in New Jersey over the Victoria Day weekend. The Partnership 2000 (P2K) program twins North American communities with those in Israel. In addition to the Awards of Excellence ceremony, the conference included an opportunity for the 45 partnerships from around the world to share best practices.

P2K PARTNERSHIP 2000

Toronto's Partnership (P2K) with Israel's Eilat-Eilot region was recently recognized as the best by The Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI) at a ceremony in New Jersey. Taking part in the presentation were (l to r): Adam Minsky, director, Israel & Overseas, UJA Federation; Jane Sherman, co-chair, Israel Department, JAFI; Zeev Bielski, chair of the executive, JAFI; Carole Solomon, chair of the Board of Governors, JAFI; Shoel Silver, co-chair, P2K for JAFI; Brian Schachter & Morley Brown, co-chairs of UJA Federation's partnership with Eliat-Eilot.

Toronto's strategic model of partnership, presented by co-chairs Morley Brown and Brian Schachter, was singled out by Jewish Agency for Israel chairman Zeev Bielski as one that other communities should be emulating. It was considered the best of its kind in North America.

The three-year-old internship program, in which high school graduates from Toronto volunteer for a minimum of six weeks in Eilat-Eilot, is one of Partnership 2000's "living bridge initiatives."

"We're bridging the gap between us and the community that we partner with, and building that bridge people-to-people," explains Michal Kaye, director of the Israel Volunteer Programs Centre, under whose auspices the internships are arranged.

"We're honoured to have won the prize for our community – it really relates to the hard work that has gone into it by both lay and professional leadership," says Schachter. "We took the kids out for dinner while we were in Israel recently and just listening to them talk, we could hear the connections that are being formed. That's the real reason we're doing this – to help the present and build for the future, and we saw that happen."

Participants, who are supported by a partnership team in Eilat, work in a variety of fields thanks to the close relationship between Toronto and Eilat-Eilot. "It gives us access to all kinds of amazing volunteer positions that we wouldn't have otherwise," explains Brown. "We've placed interns with the mayor's office and at Eilat's coral reef, with others running sports programs, teaching English, and volunteering with the fire department."

The program is part of a comprehensive development strategy underlying Toronto's partnership with Eilat-Eilot that also includes scholarships for higher education and new dormitories at the Eilat campus of Ben Gurion University, enrichment opportunities for gifted students and unique programs for weaker ones, and vocational training centres. As well, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto helped fund the Collier Centre, a community centre where interns now run after-school programs for the children of Eilat.

Ultimately, Kaye would like to see as many of the volunteers as possible working in UJA Federation-affiliated programs in Eilat "so they can understand where their money is going and get to know the people they are helping, and so the Eilatis will be able to connect the commitment of our community with actual faces."

UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education (BJE) held its annual creative writing award ceremony on Sunday, June 3. A total of 33 winning entries were chosen from 500 submissions in Hebrew and English received from BJE-affiliated schools. The winning entries were from children in grades 1 through 8 and covered a wide range of topics in poems, fiction and non-fiction stories. Winners received a certificate and various prizes. The winning entries are available on the BJE website (www.bjetoronto.org).

Inclusive public education.

The time is NOW.

For more than 30 years, Canadian Jewish Congress Ontario Region and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto have worked tirelessly together to strengthen both Jewish and public education in Ontario.

We continue to strongly advocate for fairness and inclusive public education to political leaders and the community at large.

For the past two years, working with our Jewish Federation partners in Ottawa, Hamilton and London, we have stressed the following principles in the interest of public and Jewish education throughout the province:

- Faith-based schools should be within Ontario's public sphere of education.
- Ontario faith-based schools should be treated in an equitable manner, regardless of religious affiliation.
- Like public schools, faith-based schools would also meet appropriate provincial criteria and accountability requirements.

We urge all political parties to recognize the fairness of these principles and we count on your support to make inclusive public education a reality for all of our children.
It's the Ontario way. It's the Canadian way.

Holy Blossom wraps up 150th anniversary year

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Holy Blossom Temple will wrap up its 150th anniversary year this Sunday, June 17, with a tribute concert by the Toronto Symphony Orchestra at Roy Thomson Hall.

Anniversary year chair Henrietta Chesnie didn't realize until after it was booked that there was a historical connection between the orchestra and the synagogue, which held its first service in 1856 over a drugstore. Fifty years ago, the TSO dedicated the second half of its opening concert to the temple on its 100th anniversary.

"We discovered that when looking into our archives," Chesnie told The CJN in an interview in the boardroom of the stately Bathurst Street building the congregation has occupied since 1938. "We have fabulous archives. What a treat for people to come here!" she said, referring to items that she expects will remain on display until the end of this month.

The stylish 83-year-old exudes enthusiasm for the history of the synagogue, where she has been a member for some 60 years and served as not only its first woman president but, in the early 1970s, as the first woman president of a synagogue in Canada.

"There's something awesome about 150 years of one institution, and I think people recognize that," she said.

Henrietta Chesnie

The range of programs over the past year – starting with an opening event that featured Canada's governor general, Michaëlle Jean, and followed by others such as a tour of old Jewish Toronto, a concert series, a lecture series and the creation and dedication of a new Torah – typify what Chesnie believes is Holy Blossom's greatest strength.

"We're an extremely diverse congregation. Somebody who would never think about coming to this program will love coming to that one," she said.

In May, the congregation devoted a weekend to celebrating the temple's educational history, and held a reunion of past educators, rabbis and confirmands going back to the 1930s.

Over the years, Chesnie has seen the synagogue become more traditional in its practice. As well, she said, Cantor Benjamin Maissner, who has been with Holy Blossom since 1979, "has created a congregation that is a singing and participating congregation. We sing – and we never used to. It's marvellous!"

Chesnie said the congregation today is "certainly more mainstream, as the whole Reform movement is," referring to practices such as the inclusion of more Hebrew in services and study of traditional Jewish texts. The congregation, which began as part of the Orthodox tradition, joined the Reform movement in 1921.

Reflecting on the temple's rabbis whom she has known personally, going back to Rabbi Maurice Eisendrath – who served the temple from 1929 to 1943 and who also served a role in the greater Reform community as president of the Union of American Hebrew Congregations – Chesnie said that "the tradition at Holy Blossom has been to attract strong rabbis who are leaders in the community, and they have all created the image in which Holy Blossom is held in such high esteem."

Spiritual leaders after Rabbi Eisendrath included Rabbi Abraham Feinberg, who joined John Lennon and Yoko Ono at their 1969 Montreal bed-in and recording of the song Give Peace a Chance. He was followed by renowned scholar Rabbi Gunther Plaut, rabbis Harvey Fields and Dow Marmur, and the congregation's current senior rabbi, John Moscowitz.

Rabbi Moscowitz said he thinks the anniversary year has resulted in "a deep appreciation for the past, an appreciation for those who have built and sustained this synagogue, and I would say an equal appreciation for the need to sustain it in future decades."

On a more concrete level, the congregation is embarking on a major redesign of its building that has been in the works for the past couple of years. The building also houses the southern branch of Leo Baeck Day School. Plans are expected to be finalized after a vote in mid-July.

Toronto's Jewish community responds to the needs of Sderot

UJA Federation sends one million dollars to besieged Israeli city

By DANIEL HOROWITZ
UJA FEDERATION

As word reached Toronto last month that Qassam rockets were being fired regularly at the southern Israeli city of Sderot, UJA Federation immediately swung into action by sending a million dollars to the city. The money is allowing Sderot's children to be treated to a one-week respite from the rocket fire at summer camps in safer sections of the country. UIA Federations Canada also committed one million dollars to this initiative.

The camps were made possible by the Jewish Agency for Israel (JAFI), UJA Federation's overseas partner.

"We will also have trauma counseling at the camps, to help the children deal with the impossible conditions they are living under," says the Jewish Agency's Yael Raz.

"It's very rewarding to see that so many miles away, our Toronto community understands and feels so much compassion for all the pain the children of Sderot are experiencing," notes David Koschitzky, vice-chair, UJA Federation.

JAFI, with the assistance of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and other Canadian Federations, is providing other crisis assistance for beleaguered Israelis as well.

Soon after the rockets began to fall, close to 3,000 youngsters were taken out of danger and brought to amusement parks and other locations for fun activities in central Israel – leaving the trauma behind for a short time.

Fifty-two buses brought these children to Israel's best-loved water parks and other popular attractions. Twenty-five newly arrived young people from Ethiopia were also taken to a day of fun and 250 youngsters enjoyed Israel's soccer cup finals.

The complex logistics for these massive operations were handled by Jewish Agency personnel, who risked their lives day in and day out.

Camp counselors and children from Sderot prepare to leave the city for camps in safer parts of the country.

Working closely with the local municipalities, they recruited thousands of children and made sure that there were enough accompanying counselors to provide proper supervision at all times.

About three weeks ago, JAFI produced yet another activity in record-breaking time, in which 671 Sderot and perimeter community members were brought to Jerusalem to see a performance of the Chinese Circus.

"Parents, children, singles, new immigrants and senior citizens enjoyed the fantastic antics of the circus performers. It was a pleasure to finally see joy on the faces of these people," says Ofer Baram, JAFI's public sector manager in the Southern District. "We immediately secured additional tickets from the Israel Festival to keep up with the demand. It was incredible."

The Jewish Agency, upon learning that a number of bomb shelters were in disastrous condition, provided necessities such as essential sanitary supplies, cleaning materials, fans, emergency lighting, bottled water and canned goods. At two bomb shelters, one of which serves as a youth club in a predominately Ethiopian neighbourhood, the Jewish Agency bought refrigerators and board games in the event that the residents need to stay there for an extended period of time.

Volunteers provide the heat for One HOT Day

It wasn't so much the temperature, but rather the spirit of the 120 volunteers who made Sunday, June 10 one truly HOT day.

One HOT Day, an initiative of UJA Federation's Hands on Toronto (HOT) project , brought out these eager men and women – aged 25 to 40 – all of whom were committed to delivering a day of mitzvah projects throughout the GTA.

"This particular One HOT Day was so important because we really reached out to a wide spectrum of people in need through various charities and non-profit organizations, including elderly care and worldwide humanitarian relief organizations," enthuses Natalie Glick, chair of One HOT Day.

Participants had the option of rolling up their sleeves for any one of a dozen good causes across the GTA including:

- The Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living: Working with seniors to enhance the centre's gardens.
- Kehilla Residential Programme: Assisting with rooftop gardening and spring clean-up at an apartment participating in an affordable housing initiative, sponsored by UJA Federation.
- Eva's Phoenix Shelter: Volunteers helped with spring cleaning and gardening at this unique youth shelter.
- Zareinu Moveathon: One HOT Day participants volunteered in a number of ways at this annual fundraising event for the Zareinu Educational Centre.
- Just a Second Shop: Volunteers helped sort clothing at this UJA Federation-funded store operated by Jewish Family & Child Service, so that vulnerable Toronto families will have the chance to shop with dignity.

Participants in UJA Federation's One HOT Day relax at a barbecue after spending a day volunteering their services at a number of Toronto locations.

"This is really the joy of One HOT Day, being able to better not only the community, but the world as a whole; truly dedicated to tikun olam or repairing the world," adds Glick. "The energy throughout the day was electric and the volunteers are already asking how they can be more involved with HOT and with UJA Federation in general."

Glick, herself, became involved with UJA Federation one year ago through One HOT Day and says she was so moved by the experience, she began attending several UJA Federation events and was hooked.

"When I was asked to chair One HOT Day this year, I was thrilled," says Glick. "The most obvious benefit to me is the opportunity to interact with people who you may not encounter on a day-to-day basis. Whether it's the people working for the organizations we support, the actual people receiving the help, or the other volunteers, sharing a mitzvah with someone else is a wonderful feeling and One HOT Day is the perfect route. I really encourage others to get involved. They won't regret it."

New donation rules celebrate first birthday

By JAMIE GOLOMBEK

It's now been just over one year since the federal government changed the face of philanthropy in Canada. You'll recall that on May 2, 2006, the government completely eliminated the capital gains tax on donations of listed shares, mutual funds and segregated funds to registered Canadian charities.

Jamie Golombek

And donors have been taking full advantage of government's new rule to benefit charities and eliminate their tax bill. A recent study released earlier this month by Craig Alexander, vice president and deputy chief economist with TD Economics entitled "Donating Securities Makes Good Financial Sense," demonstrates the increased potential for this type of charitable giving due to the tax benefits.

One opportunity to really maximize the value of these new rules is to donate shares you may have received around 1999 when many Canadian mutual life insurance companies, owned by their policyholders, converted to stock companies and issued shares to existing policyholders. The shares received have a tax cost or adjusted cost base (ACB) to you of zero. Ordinarily, you would pay tax on half your proceeds but by donating these shares to charity, you pay no tax at all and get a tax receipt equal to the current fair market value.

For example, Noam received shares upon an insurance demutualization that have a fair market value of $10,000 and an ACB of zero. He is considering donating these shares to charity.

If he simply sold the shares first, he would realize a capital gain of $10,000 and pay tax of about $2,250 on the gain, assuming a top marginal rate of about 45%. His net benefit, taking into account the value of the donation credit ($4,500) less the tax on the capital gain, would be about $2,250.

If, on the other hand, the shares were donated directly to charity, Noam would still be entitled to his full tax receipt for the $10,000 contributed, but since his tax liability would be completely eliminated, his net benefit would be the full $4,500.

Finally, note that this year's federal budget also extended this rule to donation of eligible appreciated securities to private foundations.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Tradition collides with technology

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

Isn't technology great? Frankly, to some, it isn't.

Advances in technology can be quite frightening. One remembers that not that long ago, television was a subject of great debate.

When television became a household item, the religious community at the time fought its entrance into the Jewish home. Television was seen as a powerful portal to an alien culture, one at odds with our own, bringing into our homes not just secularism and consumerism but a system of morals and values that conflicted with traditional Jewish ones.

The debate never ended. Today in our community, there are schools for non-TV families, schools for families prepared to strictly regulate how much and what TV is viewed by their children, and schools that merely oppose television viewing in principle.

To be sure, television is not a purely religious issue, but a societal one. Hence society censors programming and content to reflect its level of tolerance. It escapes no one that this level of tolerance continues to reach newer and newer lows all the time, as evidenced by the fact that what wasn't acceptable a mere decade ago is commonplace today.

A similar debate ensued with the advent of cellphones. With first-generation phones, one could merely converse. Second-generation phones introduced text messaging and were somewhat tolerated.

But third-generation phones have been another thing entirely. These phones can actually send and receive video clips, and one can use them to access the Internet from the convenience of a tiny screen. These third-generation cellphones quickly become unacceptable within the religious community.

Today, the technological battlefront is the Internet-capable computer. While stopping short of an outright ban on such computers, the religious community in Israel finds itself in the midst of an intense debate about them.

The Gerrer chassidic sect (by far the largest such group in Israel) has recently dispatched officials to homes of all its adherents in order to dissuade them from using the Internet. In the sect's newspaper, Hamodia, Gerrer leaders have called the Internet "the devil in disguise."

In contrast to the haredi approach is that of Shas, the Sephardi party under Rabbi Ovadia Yosef. He proposes that instead of an outright ban of computers, there should be laws governing the establishment of a "kosher Internet."

Under this proposal, presently being worked on by Israeli Communications Minister Ariel Atias (a Shas MK), censorship would take place at the level of Internet service providers nationwide.

This system would be akin to the model of North American television, in which broadcasters are regulated in areas of adult matter, violence and course language. Thus, the Internet, too, could be nationally acceptable.

Predictably, this sensible solution is encountering fierce opposition from civil libertarians. In order to counter these arguments about freedom of speech and expression, sites that are censored would still be available to those who would specifically subscribe to them, similar to some cable television channels. (Presumably, this would be subject to providing proof of age.)

This proposal, already before the Knesset, promises to be interesting.

Flowers from a stranger

By ELI RUBENSTEIN and DAPHNA LORBER

Guest Voice

The year was 2001. We were among the leaders of a group of multi-faith university students from Canada visiting Poland to study the Holocaust. In Poland, we were joined by students from the United States, Europe and Asia, all interested in learning the lessons of this devastating event in human history. The program, called the March of Remembrance and Hope, was in its first year. It was founded in the attempt to disseminate Holocaust education to a wider, more diverse audience.

During our visit to Warsaw, the tour guide showed us around all the significant locations where Jewish life thrived before the Holocaust, along with the many monuments and memorials concerning the Holocaust that were built in the last five decades.

One of our stops was at the Umschlagplatz, a stone and marble memorial at the very spot where the Jews were forced to line up for the cattle cars that took them to Treblinka and other sites of mass murder.

The structure is rectangular, with a few openings to the street. On the walls are inscribed the first names of many of the hundreds of thousands of Jewish victims whose last moments of life were experienced here. Parents parted from children, husbands from wives, grandparents from their families – all destined for a horrific journey to an even more brutal ending.

Our group of approximately 30 students sat around the stone benches within the monument as the tour guide described the process of rounding up Warsaw's Jews for their transport and ultimate annihilation.

It was springtime and Warsaw's trees were in full bloom.

Right in middle of the guide's presentation, an elderly Polish man – perhaps 80 years of age – joined our group at the Umschlagplatz. His appearance was ragged, and his manner made us suspect that perhaps he might even be intoxicated. In his hands he clutched a large bouquet of fresh flowers from the street – he must have just picked them himself from the trees surrounding the memorial.

The old man stood motionless as the guide continued to speak, seemingly out of place and out of touch with our presence and the purpose of our trip. He did not say a word, and we were certain he could not understand a single sentence the guide spoke, or for that matter, who we were and why we were there.

We exchanged annoyed and perplexed glances – with perhaps even a few snickers and rolled eyes – over this strange man's uninvited intrusion.

After a time, the old man moved. He deliberately walked over to a bench and placed the flowers under a section of the names of martyrs on one of the walls. He then returned to his spot, removed his hat and held it over his heart in an obvious sign of respect. He continued to listen, standing in this respectful fashion, until the guide finished his speech.

The group again exchanged glances, but this time there were tears in our eyes and our expressions held understanding. Suddenly – as if all at once – we comprehended the reason for his presence.

The guide finished, and the old man nodded to us and went on his way. But his abrupt and unexpected presence lingered with us for a long time.

In our subsequent discussion, we realized we all had arrived at the same conclusion: the old Polish man must have lived in this area during the war years. He must have been a witness to the wholesale removal and slaughter of his neighbours and friends, to the virtual destruction of an entire community.

His simple gesture was an attempt to pay homage to this enormous loss and to share with us in our act of commemoration.

We were there to study history. He had lived it.

Our group of students had travelled to Poland to visit the many silent monuments to the Holocaust scattered throughout the country, but he was a living witness.

We returned to Canada from Poland with many images and memories, but none so poignant and vivid as of this solitary and silent old man with a bouquet of flowers, his hat heid solemnly to his chest, with empathy in his heart and the weight of history in his eyes.

Eli Rubenstein is national director of March of the Living Canada and director of education for the March of Remembrance and Hope. Daphna Lorber was a chaperon on the March of Remembrance and Hope in 2001.

Gifted Hungarian Jews profiled

The Great Escape* by Kati Marton, Simon & Schuster.

During the 1920s and '30s, a group of gifted Hungarian Jews fled from fascist Budapest and brought their distinctive outlook on life, science and culture to the United States and western Europe.

Books
Bernard Baskin

The Great Escape profiles nine of these talented individuals. Four of them were scientists who played crucial roles in shaping the nuclear and computer age: Leo Szilard, Eugene Wigner, Edward Teller and John von Neumann.

Two were filmmakers: Michael Curtiz, who directed Casablanca and Yankee Doodle Dandy, and Alexander Korda, the first film director ever knighted, who produced The Third Man.

Two were photographers: Andre Kertesz, widely regarded as the father of photojournalism, and Robert Capa, whose pictures of the Spanish Civil War and D-Day defined war photography for generations.

Another was Arthur Koestler, author of Darkness at Noon, the prophetic novel on communist totalitarianism.

In 1939, Szilard, with two of his colleagues, induced Albert Einstein to sign a letter addressed to President Franklin D. Roosevelt, alerting him to grave danger if the Germans were to create an atomic weapon.

The letter was brought directly to FDR's attention on Oct. 11, and began the process that would lead to the creation of the Manhattan Project – the top-secret government effort to build the atomic bomb. But Roosevelt had no idea that the letter was the work of three Hungarian refugees who were not yet American citizens.

The fourth Jewish member of the Budapest Quartet was von Neumann, a world-class mathematician who was one of the fathers of the digital computer. Marton makes clear that primitive computers were vital in the progress and development of the Manhattan Project.

The author points out that these nine men "were all double outsiders once they left their native land. They were not only from a small, linguistically, impenetrable, landlocked country, they were also Jews. One could argue that, in fact, they were even triple outsiders, since they were all non-observant Jews whose families had consciously rejected the shtetl for the modern, secular, cosmopolitan world that, briefly, lay glistening in front of them."

In the generation before World War I, Jews were welcomed into Budapest for their industry, acumen and creativity. There was little anti-Semitism. But much of this changed with the postwar regime of Nicholas Horthy, Europe's first proto-fascist, and the eventual Holocaust.

Between March 19, 1944, and the end of the war about 105,000 Budapest Jews perished. Sixteen thousand Jews died during the period preceding the German occupation. Almost 50 per cent of Budapest Jews were murdered.

Two of the nine Jews profiled, Korda and Koestler, found Britain more congenial than the United States. One of Korda's wives was the celebrated actress Merle Oberon.

Koestler was one of the great political writers of the 20th century. Darkness at Noon, the first real exposé of Stalinist brutality, published in French in 1946, sold 400,000 copies. Many persons attributed the defeat of the French Communist Party in a vital referendum to the impact of this powerful book.

Marton, her parents and other family members suffered grievously at the hands of both the Nazis and communists. Her book is a lively and engaging group portrait of extraordinary individuals who changed the nature and cultural contours of our modern society.

Greening your Jewish backyard

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Want to green your own Jewish backyard, shul or community centre but don't know where to start? There are many organizations happy to share environmental advice with a Jewish ta'am (taste).

The Jewish Highway

Start your search with the Coalition on the Environment and Jewish Life. Subtitled "Protecting Creation, Generation to Generation," the website is a clearing house for practical information and social action geared to the Jewish community. [www.coejl.org]

Here's just a sample of what you'll find:

- Rabbi Fred Scherlinder Dobb's seven-point program for greening synagogues. [http://tinyurl.com/yt49tq]
- And even if you're not a rabbi, you can peek into the site's sermon starters. The next time you are faced with making a speech based on the parshat hashavuah, check out the related environmental messages. [http://tinyurl.com/269kgd]

Is it a mitzvah to be green? Manfred Gerstenfeld of the Business Ethics Center of Jerusalem has examined several environmental issues in contemporary Halachah such as whether recycling is a positive commandment. He quotes one rabbi who says that if all one has to do is to sort waste and bring it to a collection point close to one's home, throwing it elsewhere might be considered destruction and a transgression of prohibition against wanton destruction. Gerstenfeld also looks at other issues such as smoking, the wearing of fur coats and Judaism's attitude toward animals and vegetarianism. [http://tinyurl.com/2edsnz]

Canfei Nesharim ("the wings of eagles") wants to "inspire the Orthodox Jewish community to understand and act on the relationship between Halachah, traditional Jewish sources and modern environmental issues." Here's some advice from the section titled Enviro-Chuppah, tips for an environmentally friendly wedding:

- Educate your guests about your eco-friendly choices, through your wedding booklet, benschers and other gifts.
- Purchase sustainable wedding garments – a dress/suit that is practical to wear on other occasions
- Purchase local and organic produce for your reception. [www.canfeinesharim.org]

Sure what you're eating is kosher but is it healthy for you – and the environment? Hazon's Tuv Ha'Aretz program encourages local Jewish communities to buy and eat food that was grown by locally based farmers. They started off by pairing Manhattan's Congregation Ansche Chesed with Long Island's Garden of Eve Farm in 2004. Since then the program has spread to include Jewish communities in Atlanta; Berkeley, Calif.; Houston; Philadelphia; Saint Paul, Minn.; Washington, D.C.; and Modi'in in Israel – and has advice for synagogues and Jewish community centres who would like to join in. [http://tinyurl.com/yrqnba]

Want to find your spiritual side while working up a sweat? Then take a hike with Rabbi Mike Comins. The Los Angeles-based rabbi is most comfortable leading a congregation across deserts on foot, through forests on bikes or cross country on skis. Comins notes that there are hundreds of thousands of North American Jews who venture into the wilderness every year. "Consciously," and often unconsciously, they seek an avenue to express the emotions they feel in nature. When that path is not found – or worse, when the path found is not Jewish – the result is a disconnection between a person's deepest, spiritual moments and Judaism."

The rabbi hopes his programs will strengthen those connections. However, even if you won't be joining Rabbi Comins in a kayak, you can check out his writings about Judaism and the outdoors at his website. [www.torahtrek.com/writings.htm]

USYers continue rebuilding in New Orleans

> 'It was a really moving experience. It was heart-wrenching… but it was good to know we were helping people restart their lives'

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

They travelled to New Orleans in March to help rebuild homes, and they returned transformed, inspired by their hands-on experience in tikkun olam.

And last Tuesday, June 5, members of Toronto's Beit Rayim United Synagogue Youth (USY) offered the community a glimpse of what they encountered on their mission of mercy.

In a multimedia presentation titled "New Orleans: A Guided Tour – Past, Present and Future," the USYers, led by Ariel Greenbaum-Shinder, USY's regional director of youth activities, gave their snapshot of New Orleans to the public.

Held at Shaar Shalom Synagogue in Thornhill, the event drew a stream of curious parents, friends and community members who were interested in seeing what the USYers did and finding out what more can be done to help the residents of Hurricane Katrina-ravaged Louisiana.

Guests were also encouraged to make a small monetary donation, with all funds going toward further New Orleans relief efforts.

The CJN last reported on these USY activities on April 5, when members sat down to discuss the impact of their trip. In the ensuing months, the students worked to put together photo collages, Internet videos and music to bring their experiences back home for display.

Students led groups of three or four guests at a time on a tour of different displays set up in the shul's basement.

Two USYers, Simon Edwards and David Wallach, provided a running commentary to The CJN, explaining how they felt as they pointed out pictures of demolished houses, abandoned clothing and ruined landscapes that affected them deeply while working in New Orleans.

"It was a really moving experience," Wallach said. "It was heart-wrenching… but it was good to know we were helping people restart their lives."

Edwards echoed his friend's sentiment, adding, "We never met any of the families or people we were helping. But that was probably better, because the best type of tikkun olam is when you don't know who you're helping and they don't know who helped them… that makes it a greater mitzvah."

Though they admitted it was a very hard trip emotionally, both teens expressed unbridled enthusiasm for the next USY-led trip, planned for March 2008.

"We'll do another trip next March break," Greenbaum-Shinder said. "We can accommodate as many people who want to go. But people should understand that the cost is prohibitive… almost $800 (US) per person."

She added that UJA Federation of Greater Toronto was helpful in providing grants to help offset the costs for the trip this year, and she hoped additional funding would be available to lower the expense even more for travellers next year.

Cheri Szereszewski, youth director for Beit Rayim Synagogue, helped organize the event with the aid of her daughter, Rachel, also a New Orleans volunteer.

She expressed immense pride in her daughter and all the USY volunteers involved in the New Orleans project and hoped the event would help garner more exposure for New Orleans and drive up donations of food, clothing and books for victims of Katrina.

"They really have continued [using] this experience to make a difference in both their lives and in the world," she said. "That's what Judaism and tikkun olam is all about. Hopefully tonight, we'll be able to raise some more money to send back [to New Orleans] to carry the kids' experience forward."

To make a donation or for more information, contact Cheri Szereszewski at Beit Rayim synagogue at 905-889-0276, ext.25

Temple Har Zion preschool to close

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

After more than 25 years in operation, Temple Har Zion's preschool is closing because of dwindling enrolment.

There are not enough children to fill the school's half-day classes, because more parents are opting for full-day programs, the temple's executive director, Karen Grimm, said last week.

"The needs of the young Jewish family today are changing, because more women are working," she said.

The preschool, which this year had 35 children, offered a morning nursery class, morning and afternoon junior kindergarten classes and two senior kindergarten enrichment classes.

At its height, it served more than 100 students.

The decision to close down after the school year ends this week was not made for financial reasons."We would back our school," Grimm said.

Rather, explained preschool supervisor Rickie Glickman, who oversees a staff of four teachers, class sizes were not optimal for socialization.

However, both Grimm and Glickman said they see the change as a "hiatus" more than a closing.

Glickman phoned all the parents by the end of May to notify them personally about the closing, and all registration deposits for next year have been returned, she said.

The parents were "very sad" to hear the news, Grimm said. She added that some parents are organizing a reunion this fall to recognize the preschool and its teachers.

Because of the school's parent participation component, she said, "I had to hire teachers that were excellent, because every day they would be scrutinized by a different parent [who was in the class]."

As supervisor, Glickman said she wanted the children to be treated "the way I would treat my own children," and also to provide "a positive preschool experience with a strong Judaic component, but most importantly a place where, when parents left their children, they could feel confident that they were in a safe and caring and loving environment."

The administrators said it's too early to say if the temple might consider running full-day preschool programs.

In the months ahead, said Glickman, "I think we have to think out of the box and see how we can utilize [the preschool] space."

CJC: time to stand and applaud

In a harsh critique of Bylaw 67, a new governance structure to be introduced at the upcoming Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) plenary, an opinion piece by Michael Brown in The CJN ("The assisted suicide of the CJC: Does it matter?," June 14) asks whether the Canadian Jewish community should "laugh or cry" over this long-needed change to CJC's governing structure.

Guest Voice

Those in our community who have been "on the ground" and part of grassroots Jewish advocacy for years know full well and understand that the changes being contemplated are necessary if CJC wishes to maintain its status as Canada's most vital Jewish advocacy organization. Instead of laughing or crying, today's leadership is making another statement: "It is time to stand and applaud the changes to CJC's governance."

The article argues that the democratic structure of CJC is being eroded, that we are in fact "assisting in its suicide." Nonsense. CJC has always been the sum of its parts. The grassroots emanated from the regions, and within the new governance model, regions remain the source of our strength for the future. Hence elections remain a vital and necessary part of regional governance.

Bearing in mind that regional chairs will sit on the new streamlined executive, there is now clearly more influence and impact for democratically elected lay leaders to have a real and ongoing influence on the Jewish body politic. In fact, the regions will have more representation in the new model than they ever had in the past.

The other changes being contemplated in Bylaw 67 address a past governing structure hampered and ill-served by procedures that, while appearing democratic on the outside, were far from it on the inside. Indeed, in the last 25 years, there has only been one election at a CJC triennial plenary, in 1995. And that one was so riddled with problems that an internal judicial inquiry had to be called. In fact, at times it was a struggle to fill vacant officers' positions and the opportunity for "amcha" to be part of that process, despite the veneer of a democratic front, was at best limited, if not non-existent.

In the past, CJC comprised a national council of more than 1,000 people, a national executive of more than 125 people, and a national officers body of more than 50. This is in addition to regional councils, executives and officers that also numbered in the hundreds. The sad part was that very often they were only names on a page. Few, if any, participated or were active in the ongoing advocacy affairs of the community. Truth be told, it was a small group of officers and the appointed committees of CJC – such as the community relations committee, the Internet hate committee, the national Darfur committee or the war crimes committee – that undertook the necessary work.

Bylaw 67 ensures that the committee structure not only remains intact but is enhanced. Through Bylaw 67, a streamlined executive established through an open and apparent communal procedure recognizes and allows for straightforward flow of and access to information, as well as the ability to respond immediately to events that have an impact on Jewish communal life. It provides an ease of governance that is transparent and fully accountable to the community that funds it.

Finally, Brown suggests that Canadian Jewish advocacy is becoming "Americanized," thus playing on the reflexive Canadian aversion to all things south of the border. The Jewish community in Canada, however, knows better. Organizations such as the famed American Jewish Committee, the Anti-Defamation League, and the American Jewish Congress, all operating with a similar governance structure as being contemplated by CJC, are arguably among the most influential lobby groups in the world. Why not take the very best of their governing bylaws, coupled with the very best of ours, and create a new and dynamic CJC that will be as always uniquely Canadian and uniquely Jewish?

Change is difficult. But holding on to false vestiges of the past to forgo change is not in the best interests of amcha.

Judaica store marks a quarter-century

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Israel's The Judaica Centre opened its doors in Toronto 25 years ago and business is still booming – locally and abroad.

"I felt for the longest time that what we considered the downtown part of the city, Eglinton, which is a very large Jewish community, was underserviced, and I felt that we could do a lot, both in Jewish literature and in artifacts," said Kaplan, who is 60.

And until June 17, the store is having a major sale for its anniversary. Up for grabs is a free trip to Israel. Any purchase over $25 gets you a raffle entry for the draw to be held on Chanukah.

From the start, Kaplan's goal was to have a store for Jews from any background.

"Because we positioned ourselves in the city as being open to the entire spectrum of Conservative, Orthodox, Reform and totally irreligious, that makes us unique," he said.

"It's a very comfortable environment," added his wife, Susie, who came on board 15 years ago and runs the wholesale operations.

Kaplan said his staff are trained not to discriminate against anyone who comes into the store. For example, staff learn to sell a tallit to a woman, something that may be uncomfortable for some of them.

Israel's opened in a 1,000-square-foot store on Eglinton, a few blocks from its current location just west of Bathurst Street, at 870 Eglinton Ave. W. Since then, the store has moved twice and expanded greatly. Israel's has a second location at 441 Clark Ave. W. in Thornhill, managed by the Kaplans' son David.

Kaplan believes it is important for smaller Jewish communities to be able to access Judaica products.

The business takes orders from across the globe on its website, israelsjudaica.com, and has products in large chain food and card stores.

Kaplan also regularly holds a book-fair-like event, shipping books and gifts to cities across the country, including Vancouver, Winnipeg and Regina.

Among the store's best-selling items are kippot, cookbooks and greeting cards. Also popular is kosher candy imported from Israel, products from companies that do not have a hechsher in North America. For example, Wrigley gum products are sold by the store's subsidiary, Israel Candy Company.

In addition, keeping up with the times is crucial to business, Kaplan said.

"Today, for good or for bad you can buy a knitted kippah that has the [Toronto] Raptors on it or Batman… There may be some people who are against that kind of stuff because it might be a dilution, but how else do you reach out to kids and to the public?"

The Kaplans have seen other changes over the years. When the store opened, Kaplan said, it was rare to see someone on Eglinton wearing a kippah. Now, this is not the case.

Generally, the demand for more religious and ritual items is greater at the Thornhill store, but he said there is starting to be a noticeable shift downtown.

Israel and Susie Kaplan

But no story about Israel Kaplan is complete without a mention of his activism in his namesake country.

"A lot of people come into the store and they say that they love shopping here because of him, because of what he stands for, and they believe that's why they should be supporting the store, because of all the work that he does for Israel," Susie said.

Her husband is vice-president of the Toronto Zionist Council, and the couple visit Israel often. Their two daughters live there and they have staff and business contacts overseas.

"I didn't take up golfing 10 years ago… I took up getting involved in Israel," Kaplan said.

When his family was young, his mother would bless his children by saying, "May you be a leader in Israel."

"I trained my kids to laugh at it, I saw it as a joke," he remembered.

"When she died and I became involved in matters of Israel, only then did I know what she was talking about, because as an adult, I took a more active role and found out that our leadership was very lacking."

A highlight both in the Kaplans' Israel involvement and in their store history was the "Israel Mall" they brought to Canada in the summer of 2002, to showcase Israeli products.

Kaplan made sure to foster connections among Canadian buyers.

"That was very important for me, that it wasn't just like a beginning and an end… but there would be continuous exports out of Israel to help these guys."

The possibility that he and his wife will make aliyah in the next two years is "very real," Kaplan said. But the landmark store won't be closing its doors anytime soon.

"There's so much more we can do, so many different areas we can go into," Susie said.

Quebec mayor reassures chassidim after arson

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Val David Mayor Pierre Lapointe came to an Outremont synagogue last week to reassure chassidic summer residents that the Laurentian village is still a safe place for them despite the arson of a family home there.

Lapointe made the visit the day after a house in an enclave of about 110 dwellings owned by Satmar families was destroyed in an overnight fire June 5.

He told them at the closed-door meeting that his council has "zero tolerance" for anti-Semitism and will do what it can to ensure Jewish residents' safety. He said he will see that any apparently hate-motivated incidents are looked into, although policing of the vast Laurentians is limited.

An attempt was made to set the same house ablaze on the previous Saturday morning, but that fire was contained quickly by firefighters. Damage to the two-storey house, which was a year or two old, is estimated at more than $200,000. None of the homeowners was in the vicinity at the time of either incident.

The provincial police, the Sûreté du Québec (SQ), determined that the fire was deliberately set, but had not designated the incident as a hate crime at The CJN's deadline. No evidence was found of anti-Semitic intent, such as graffiti or a note, nor had any threats been received.

But there is no question in the mind of Meyer Feig, director of the Jewish Orthodox Council for Community Relations and a Satmar community member, that this was an attack on the highly visible community.

"Was it anti-Semitism? That is the million-dollar question. In my gut, I feel that it was. But the police have their criteria," he said.

Feig visited the site after the first small fire. He saw attempts to ignite motor-oil-soaked furnishings in three rooms on the first floor.

Last summer, he said there was some troubling harassment of the community's children, such as having paintballs and rocks thrown at them, as well as slurs uttered.

"We called the police [the SQ], but it took 30 to 45 minutes for them to get here. They told us they are patrolling seven municipalities with just three cars," Feig said.

Feig appreciated the mayor's gesture. "He said he stands in solidarity with the community. He told us not to be afraid to come back, because that would be caving in to the demands of [the perpetrators]."

The Satmar neighbourhood is located in the Prefontaine sector of Val David, about 80 kilometres north of Montreal. Val David, which has a year-round population of 5,000, is a popular vacation and recreational destination, and home to a number of people in the arts.

Chassidim have been living in the area in significant and growing numbers since the late 1970s. By late June, much of the community decamps to the country, living in areas with their own synagogues and schools.

Alex Werzberger, president of the Coalition of Outremont Chassidic Organizations, said it might be natural to assume the incident was motivated by anti-Semitism, but he said he can't draw that conclusion definitively.

Werzberger, a Satmar chassid himself who has had a country home in neighbouring Val Morin for decades, noted that crime, such as theft and vandalism, is rife in the area and the neighbourhood where the fire took place is isolated.

"Was it hate or just vandalism – who knows? But the suspicion is always there, especially now when a certain atmosphere has been created," he said, referring to the debate in Quebec over accommodating religious differences, which has put chassidim under scrutiny.

Canadian Jewish Congress said it is deeply concerned by the setting of a chassidic home on fire, and it expressed appreciation of the reaction of the police and mayor. However, it's not explicitly calling it a hate crime for the time being.

"Arson, by definition, is not an accident or a coincidence," CJC, Quebec region, president Victor Goldbloom said in a statement.

"It is therefore a concern to the whole of society. The police have responded vigorously, and we hope that the perpetrator or perpetrators will rapidly be brought to justice.

"Congress expresses its appreciation to Val David Mayor Pierre Lapointe for his sense of civic responsibility and his sensitivity. We offer him and the police our full co-operation."

A $5,000 reward for information leading to an arrest and conviction is being offered through the Sun Youth Organization. Director Sid Stevens described the anonymous donor as French-Canadian.

The approximately 1,000 marchers stopped in front of the Indigo bookstore to call for its boycott because majority owners Heather Reisman and Gerry Schwartz established the Heseg Foundation, a fund to support former Israel Defence Forces members who have no family in Israel. According to a flyer distributed, the Israeli military has committed war crimes and these lone soldiers tend to come from abroad.

Also in the march was Amir Khadir, co-leader of Québec solidaire, the new sovereignist party that ran candidates in all but one riding in the March election, and Eleni Bakopanos, former federal Liberal MP and current Liberal candidate in Ahuntsic.

The PQ and Québec solidaire endorsed a declaration issued by the coalition at a press conference June 6, along with 30 other Quebec groups that condemn Israel's 40 years of alleged occupation, violations of international law and Palestinian rights, and defiance of United Nations resolutions.

The declaration calls on the federal government to demand that Israel immediately withdraw from the West Bank, Gaza (which it calls "an open-air prison"), east Jerusalem and the Golan, and dismantle Jewish settlements and its "wall of shame," the security barrier.

It also urges the Harper government to restore aid to the Hamas-dominated Palestinian Authority, Israel to stop its "target assassinations of Palestinian leaders and arbitrary arrests of Palestinian parliamentarians," and the right of return or compensation for Palestinians, as well as the de-listing of Jewish National Fund.

The coalition does not denounce Palestinian terrorism and makes only a passing reference to Israel's security concerns.

Among the other signatories listed are unions representing public school and CEGEP teachers, the Fédération des femmes du Quebec and La ligue des droits et libertés.

In an interview, Turp said the PQ's "balanced" policy on the Middle East has not changed, but that the party feels it is "very important to show solidarity with the Palestinians."

He deplored Israel's "numerous" violations of international law and UN Security Council resolutions going back to No. 242, its repression of the Palestinians and its ignoring "the very clear" ruling of the International Court of Justice against the security barrier.

Speaking before the march, Turp said he would feel "uncomfortable" if Hezbollah symbols were displayed.

The Bloc and the federal Liberals are not listed as endorsers of the declaration. Ménard said his party did not sign because it believes a broad-based international conference must be held to end the conflict. But otherwise he said the Bloc agrees with the substance of the declaration.

PQ MNA Louise Harel, who walked beside Turp, was to present a petition, similar to the declaration, to the National Assembly last Friday, but Turp told The CJN this did not happen.

In his remarks to the demonstrators, Turp, a Université de Montréal law professor, emphasized Israel's non-compliance with international law and the UN.

He briefly mentioned Israel's security and said the PQ "condemns all terrorism."

Khadir told the demonstrators that Israel's actions are "a shame for all humanity" and called for an international campaign against Israel similar to that which toppled apartheid in South Africa.

Turp told The CJN the PQ has taken no position on a boycott of Israel.

Walking in front of the marchers were artists Devora Neumark and Tali Goodfriend, dressed in black and their faces veiled, who carried an uprooted Russian olive tree, symbolizing, they said, the displacement of Palestinians.

The marchers stopped in front of Place des Arts to set up a mock roadblock. Three people in army uniforms forced three others wrapped in Palestinian flags face down onto the pavement.

Executive director of the Quebec-Israel Committee, Luciano Del Negro, said the expressed its "deep disappointment" that the parties would associate with the coalition's position which he described as "obscenely and virulently anti-Israel."

The demands made will "manifestly not do anything to promote dialogue or the peace process," and are particularly "outrageous" at a time when Israel is being daily shelled by Hamas-backed factions.

"These people are more intent on delegitimizing Israel than resolving the conflict," Del Negro said.

Two outlooks on famous landmark cases that have shaped our society.

Join Join Arthur Stern, renowned Toronto criminal lawyer, and popular Aish Rabbis, Dan Rand and Dovid Zauderer, who will present the secular and Torah perspectives on 3 contentious and controversial legal cases.

The Miranda Warning - Wednesday, June 13
One of the most famous legal terms is the Miranda warning. It is taken as a fundamental requirement to safeguarding the rights of all citizens. This session will describe the precedent setting case that established this law and explore it's beneficial and injurious impact. The Torah's unique take will bring new clarity to our understanding on the concept of warning suspects.

The Rodriguez Case - Wednesday, June 20
There is probably no greater emotional legal situation than the controversy over Euthanasia, also known as assisted suicide. The case of Sue Rodriguiz captured the imagination of Canada as this young woman appealed to the Supreme Court to be allowed a physician assisted suicide. Our experts in Canadian law and Torah ethics will challenge us to examine our own perspective on the legal and moral implications of "mercy killing."

The Zundel Case - Wednesday, June 27
Fundamental to a free society is free speech. At the same time the simple example of yelling "fire" in a crowded building is recognized as being untenable. To have clarity is to see both sides of an issue. This session will "defend" and "prosecute" the man who galvanized the nation about this issue. The Torah and Talmud viewpoints will focus and deepen our understanding.

Memory lapses and glaring omissions

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

The common complaint that much of the media has a short attention span and an even shorter historical memory, even for its own coverage, was clearly illustrated by the influential Economist magazine in its lead editorial "Israel's wasted victory" (May 26).

Although traditionally very critical of Israel, the Economist has gone out of its way in the past few years to commend Israel for seeking compromise and peace with the Palestinians. It even called former Israeli prime minister Ariel Sharon a "peacemaker" for his decision to disengage from Gaza.

But that editorial understanding seems to have been forgotten.

Whereas the magazine once criticized former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat for rejecting a "once in 50 years" deal during the Camp David/Taba negotiations of 2000-2001, it now takes a more skeptical approach, placing Israel's "generous offer" in ironic quotes.

As for Sharon, the Economist similarly downgrades his contribution: "Ariel Sharon, it is true, dragged Israel out of the Gaza Strip two years ago. But so what?"

The Economist doesn't place all the blame on Israel for the protracted conflict. But whereas a few short years ago it recognized that Israel was prepared for major territorial compromise while the Palestinians under Arafat would not even accept the legitimacy of a Jewish state, today the publication presents a form of moral equivalence, placing the blame on both sides, but with Israel's "folly" of occupation and settlements bearing the brunt. The absolute rejection of Israel by the Hamas-led Palestinian Authority merits almost no attention.

The Economist proposes a return to former U.S. president Bill Clinton's "bridging" proposals of 2000 – precisely what Arafat refused and Hamas now rejects. Israel is officially committed to a two-state solution, while the Hamas government is officially committed to Israel's destruction. How Clinton's ideas are supposed to be implemented is anyone's guess.

Nonetheless, if the Economist's historical revisionism is unfortunate, the Globe and Mail's analysis is dismaying. The front-page story "Six days fuelled 40 years of fighting" by Mark MacKinnon and Carolynne Wheeler (June 4) was an extremely one-sided look at the aftermath of the Six Day War from a mostly Palestinian point of view.

Unlike the Economist, which at least acknowledges that Israel was fighting a war of self defence in 1967, MacKinnon and Wheeler write as if Israel's victory was the main – and seemingly only – cause of the conflict.

The historical facts omitted by the Globe are glaring:

- Israel urged Jordan's King Hussein to stay out of the fighting.
- Following the war, Israel's offer to exchange land for peace was rebuffed by the Arabs' infamous "Three Nos": no peace, no recognition, and no negotiations with Israel.
- Years later, in exchange for peace treaties, Israel gave up land to Egypt (in 1979) and to Jordan (in 1994).
- Israel even ceded land to the Palestinians under Oslo II (1995) and was prepared to give up a great deal more for the sake of ending the remaining "occupation" in exchange for peace, but in the fall of 2000, Arafat rejected the offer and chose a path of violence instead.

Unfortunately, none of these facts about the war and its aftermath found their way into the Globe story.

* * *

"The Explanation We Never Heard" by Shiraz Dossa, the St. Francis Xavier University political science professor who gained a measure of infamy by attending the Holocaust denial conference in Tehran, appeared in the June issue of the Literary Review of Canada.

Dossa writes that Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has never called the Holocaust a "myth," or said that Israel must be wiped "off the map." But Iran's own news agency shows that Dossa is wrong on both counts.

Dossa even argues that the conference was not about Holocaust denial (even if a few "deniers/skeptics" attended) and that it was sponsored by IPIS, an independent, internationally respected institute, not by Ahmadinejad.

In fact, IPIS belongs to the Iranian foreign ministry and is thus not separate from the virulently anti-Semitic pronouncements of the Iranian regime, which is intent on denigrating the Holocaust in order to delegitimize Israel.

Dossa's penchant for the absurd reached new heights when he insisted in a letter to the Globe and Mail (June 5), that the "IPIS invited [Holocaust deniers/skeptics] to stress that anti-Semitism is [only] a western, white, Christian obsession."

Colin Powell headlines Hamilton Negev Dinner

By ABIGAIL CUKIER
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — Former U.S. secretary of state Colin Powell told Hamilton's Jewish National Fund Negev Dinner to "revel" in the fact demonstrators were outside protesting the Iraq War and U.S. support of Israel, saying that the right to peaceful protest is a cornerstone of democracy.

"Remember don't shut down. We have to stay open. That is how we will beat terrorism," the retired general told the June 3 event's 1,300 attendees.

"We must stay strong, stay together and remain free and open societies, Canada and the United States."

Heightened security measures in North America are necessary, but the continent is not as welcoming as it once was and needs to be, said Powell, the keynote speaker at Hamilton's 54th Negev Dinner, which honoured Tom and Sasha Weisz and was held at the city's convention centre.

Powell recalled that as a boy in the South Bronx, he had many Jewish friends and worked for a baby equipment store owned by Jews, where he learned some Yiddish, allowing him to secretly understand customers.

He remembered the excitement of his Jewish friends when the State of Israel was founded in 1948, and that the United States stood beside Israel then and now.

"I will tell you that will never change," he said, adding Canada and the United States must continue trying to solve the Israeli-Palestinian conflict.

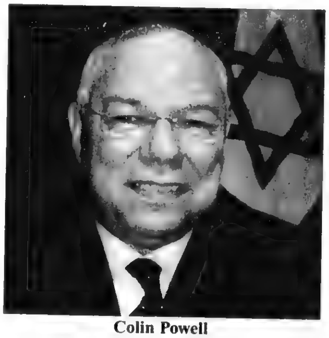
"Western leadership will be needed to seize opportunities to solve the crisis."

Powell also said his country will never forget what Canada did it after Sept. 11, including taking in American passengers from grounded planes.

"That reinforced to us what a great friend we had in Canada," he said. "Canada is the United States' best friend, with shared values and a belief in democracy and freedom."

Powell said the Weiszs are fulfilling the obligation of all people blessed with success – to give back.

Friends, family members and local politicians repeatedly also praised the couple for their devotion to family and friends and for their desire to help others.



Colin Powell

Hamilton-area MP David Sweet, Ontario Intergovernmental Affairs Minister Marie Bountrogianni, and Hamilton Mayor Fred Eisenberger joined the tribute to the honorees.

Sasha was born in Hamilton to Rose and Allen Swaye. Tom's parents, Margaret and Arthur married during World War II in Hungary. They survived the Holocaust and were reunited. In June 1946, Tom was born in Hungary.

When Tom was two, the family fled Communist rule to a displaced persons camps in Austria. After about two years, they left for Canada and settled in Hamilton.

Sasha and Tom met at Westdale High School in Hamilton in the 1960s and got married in 1968. Sasha became a nurse and Tom a lawyer. They are parents of Eric and Danna and her husband David and grandparents of Sari, Mitchell and Jamie Rose.

Tom is president and CEO of Effort Trust, a trust company he incorporated with his father in 1978. He serves on the JNF board of directors and is a member of McMaster University's board of governors and a board member of the Art Gallery of Hamilton. He also co-chairs the Hamilton Future Fund and is a past board member of St. Joseph's Hospital.

Sasha chairs the women's division of State of Israel Bonds and is president of the Deborah Sisterhood at Hamilton's Temple Anshe Sholom. She also volunteers for Shalom Village and Hadassah WIZO.

Weiszs chose to direct proceeds from the dinner to the rehabilitation of the Biriyya Forest in northern Israel. It's one of the largest forests in the country with about five million trees. Katyusha rockets burned about 20 per cent of its area during last summer's war with Hezbollah.

Sasha said that since it's a tourist attraction, the development of the forest will also restore jobs to the community.

In addition to replanting trees and widening an access road, the project will include an accessible promenade to be built around the site of the ancient Nevoraya Synagogue, which dates back to 250 BCE.

You have the right to know if your son's not in school

Family Matters

John Syrtash
B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.

Question. I pay monthly support payments (which are garnished from my paycheque by the Family Responsibility Office) of $600 a month.

My son is 18 years old and I have become aware that he is no longer living with his mother or in full-time school. Under my separation agreement, it states that I pay support until he is the age of 18 or my son is attending full-time schooling.

I wrote to the Family Responsibility office and advised them that I felt I should no longer be paying child support as my son was no longer in school full time and he was no longer living with my ex-wife.

The Family Responsibility Office sent a letter to my ex-wife with this information and they received a letter back from her advising that this was not true. There was no information about which school or how many hours a week he was in school or his present address.

The Family Responsibility Office advised me that this was all they could do and I would have to hire a lawyer to go any further. I would like to know what information I would be entitled to and what proof I would need to enforce my separation agreement.

Do I have the right to know which school he is attending, how many hours a week he is attending school and where he is living? If he is not living with his mother, but can prove he is attending full-time school, would the support payments go directly to my son?

Answer. You have every right to know this information and to stop paying child support.

However, to enforce the separation agreement you will have to commence a court application in which you will ask the judge for a court order to permit you to stop paying child support retroactively to the date your son left school or moved out of his mother's house permanently.

At the very beginning of such a lawsuit, you can deliver a written request to the mother by way of a "Form 20", demanding to know what school the child is attending, to obtain a copy of his latest transcripts, and a tuition receipt to confirm his alleged status as a student.

Once the questions are not appropriately answered, you can take the mother's inappropriate lack of response to the judge. The judge will then likely grant you the order you seek, that the court will then file with the Family Responsibility Office. You can then pay your son directly, if you wish.

Film profiles Ottawa's venerable Rideau Bakery

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — It's a well-known yet unfortunate fact that family businesses in Canada rarely make it past the second generation, but Ottawa's only kosher bakery is a rare exception.

The Rideau Bakery, now operated by brothers Louis and David Kardish, has its roots in a small village in the Ukraine. The brothers' great-grandmother, Rifka Kardish, baked bread to support her 12 children while her husband, Moishe, taught Hebrew.

The recipes she used in the late 1800s were passed along to her sons Abie and Dovid, who opened the original Rideau Bakery in 1930 after immigrating to Canada.

The remarkable story of the Rideau Bakery, as well as the now very large Kardish family (many of whom have worked in the bakery at some point in their lives), has been captured in a documentary film titled One of the Last, produced with funding from OMNI Television Independent Producers Initiative.

The project began as a natural outgrowth of an earlier project by the pair.

"Jane had done a lot of research about the Rideau Bakery and its lunch counter, because we were working on another documentary about the disappearing lunch counters," Kucerak said.

The lunch counter at Rideau Bakery – which, say the Kardish brothers, is more or less non-profit – is a very popular meeting place for its regular customers.

They come from far and near – some because it's kosher, but many because it serves great sandwiches on fresh bread and provides an opportunity to meet and chat with some very interesting people.

The film offers a glimpse into the behind-the-scenes work involved in producing a great loaf of bread, but it's also a warm and touching peek into the lives of the Kardish family, as well as their longtime and loyal employees, who say they were made to feel like part of the family.

"A special thank you to the Kardish family, especially to Louis, David and Debbie [Baylin], who allowed us to get into the bakery at all hours, to get into their lives and into their hearts," Kucerak said.

He added that by including a scene shot in the Ukraine on the site of the original bakery, "they made it come to life on the screen and gave us a connection to the past."

Many in the audience at the sold-out screening were members of the extended Kardish family or had worked in the bakery at some point. All enjoyed a dessert buffet of Rideau Bakery goodies after the film.

Proceeds from the screening were to be donated to several charities in which Kardish family members are involved.

The television premiere of One of the Last will be broadcast in Ontario on OMNI.1 at 9 p.m. on June 17, and at the same time on June 23, Aug. 2 and Sept. 1.

Obituary

Lipsitz nurtured lay leadership

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Edmond Yehuda Lipsitz, a longtime Jewish civil servant, author and educator, died on June 2 of prostate cancer. He was 81.

Among his many accomplishments, he served as director of education for Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, responsible for Jewish education in small communities; then he became executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region; and later he held the position of associate director of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Lipsitz was born in Ujhel, Hungary, and had a traditional Jewish religious education. However, his son, Jeffrey, said that he believed that it was important to also have a trade, so he became an electrician.

"My father believed that this saved his life. When he and his family was deported to Auschwitz in 1944, his skill allowed him to escape the forced marches that many others had to endure."

After the war, finding that nothing remained of his hometown Jewish community, he went to Budapest, where he received smichah (rabbinic ordination).

The Jewish Agency brought him to Israel, where he worked in Tel Aviv for the Israel Electric Company. It was here that he met and married his wife, Clara Leah, also a Holocaust survivor.

In 1956, he came to Canada, and became a Hebrew teacher in Kirkland Lake. When his wife and their daughter, Sarah, came, they were horrified that "the temperature was 60 degrees lower than in Tel Aviv." They promptly moved to London, where he led services at Or Shalom Synagogue and served as principal of the synagogue's Hebrew school.

In 1965, the family moved to Montreal, where he served as executive of Keren Hatarbut and helped develop Hebrew-speaking Camp Mossad.

Along the way, he earned a BA and a MSc in zoology at the University of Western Ontario, and an MEd and a PhD in biochemistry at McGill.

He began his career with Canadian Jewish Congress in Toronto in 1972, where he stayed until he retired in 1989.

Retirement was a relative term for Lipsitz. He took a series of positions, including ones at the Elwyn Foundation and Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem, and became principal of the Kitchener Hebrew School.

Education, both formal and informal, was a lifelong passion, according to Lipsitz and Susan Jackson, now executive director of the Jewish Heritage Centre, who also worked in small communities. "If you wanted to learn how to do communal work in a professional way, you could learn from him," she said.

Jackson described him as "a visionary," "a nurturer of lay leadership," a pluralist in religion and politics at a time when it was unusual and always an educator. "He knew that the future was in in the hands of the young."

Jerry Tollinsky, national executive director of Canadian Friends of Boys Town Jerusalem, said that Lipsitz passed on to him "an understanding of the challenges faced in communal work and that the most important aspect of that was building relationships with the lay people."

He said that the organization has established a scholarship in his memory.

Lipsitz published a number of directories, including directories of the Ontario and Toronto Jewish communities, Who's Who in Canadian Jewish Women and Who's Who in Canadian Jewry, as well as Olam Shalem, a series of tapes and workbooks to help people learn Hebrew, and 6400 Questions About Judaism and the Jewish People.

One of the projects he is most noted for is providing Pesach food for the beleaguered Cuban Jewish community. Jackson noted that he began the effort in the late 1970s, "when the Iron Curtain was there and the Berlin Wall was still up."

He is survived by his wife Clara Leah; his daughter Sarah Lipsitz; his son Dr. Jeffrey Lipsitz and his wife Judith Laxer; and four grandchildren, Avi, Yonatan, Michal and Orly. A brother and sister survived the camps, but both have died.

Hillel@York hockey team scores higher

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

York University's Hillel hockey team played harder and better – and became more well-known – this season than ever before.

"We're no longer looked at as an easy win," said forward and alternate captain Brian Gerskup.

"I think this year we won more games than we have any other year," said Shawn Groyeski, centre, team captain and chair of Hillel sports at York. "That's attributed to us going out and finding a good group of guys who want to play and want to win."

The team made it to the first round of York's intramural playoffs this past season, which spanned from October to February. And within the school's two-tiered intramural system, Hillel's hockey crew moved from the bottom of the second tier to the top.

The roster boasted more than 20 members, 11 of whom were new to the team.

Groyeski said that prior to this year, the team faced challenges with publicity and communications.

He and Gerskup were instrumental in changing that this year.

Groyeski, a kinesiology and exercise science student, transferred to York from the University of Western Ontario two years ago.

"I fell in love with the organization and figured I wanted to be involved," he said of his new school's Hillel.

Groyeski played on the hockey team his first year, but felt it could have been managed better.

Once elected sports chair, he and Gerskup put their heads together to shake things up.

"What we ended up doing was trying to come up with a way to get us really nice jerseys, so players on the other teams who might be eligible to play for us would come over and say, 'Where do we sign up?' which is exactly what happened," Gerskup said.

With a $1,500 gift from Howard Sokolowski, CEO of the Tribute Communities building firm, the team was able to subsidize the cost of 40 jerseys. The uniform helped the team become recognized both on and off the ice, as people would wear the shirt on campus to show their support.

Gerskup explained that Jewish students at York have the option of playing for their college or for Hillel.

Since many people didn't know about the Hillel team, he said, the idea behind the jerseys was to help boost its visibility and convince other players to switch.

"Our main goal was to bring Jewish hockey players back to playing with other Jewish students instead of with other teams around campus, and as a result, bringing them to Hillel and reuniting them with the Jewish community in many cases," said Gerskup.

One the team's first-year players, Jonathan Tulchinsky, was recruited to play for the Israeli national hockey team at the Division II World Hockey Championships in Seoul, Korea, in April.

"It was very fast paced, there was a lot to do in minimal time," said Tulchinsky of his time in Seoul, where Israel won a bronze medal. "It was a great experience."

Besides getting the word out, the team has faced other obstacles.

For instance, while Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are school-wide holidays at York, in the past, games have been slated for other Jewish festivals, such as Sukkot and Simchat Torah, which has led to conflicts over scheduling with the university, Gerskup said.

(York's director of intramural programs, Mike Broderick, said the onus is on teams to give him ample notice of holiday dates so as to avoid scheduling problems.)

But scheduling isn't the team's only challenge.

"We've had issues on ice with having to deal with people making racial slurs and all sorts of things," he added.

"It's frustrated teams who couldn't deal with things, and it comes out on the ice and it's disheartening in trying to get this team off the ground."

But overall, the year was a success.

"Being able to get a bunch of guys together on a weekly basis, consistently coming out to play, was something nice that we didn't really have beforehand," Groyeski said.

"When you put a bunch of Jews together in a room, you have a bunch of opinions, but we're here to achieve one common goal – to win some games and have fun."

Next year, Hillel hopes to have two teams, one recreational and one competitive.

"The goal is to increase our engagement," said Groyeski. "If we can successfully have two teams that means we will have successfully reached out to 30 players. We've never had a pool of players to choose from."

The Hillel@York hockey team is gearing up for September's tryouts. For more information or to get involved, e-mail Shawn Groyeski at groyeski@yorku.ca.

After the Wedding

תגובה 10:

תגובה 12:

תגובה 23:

לתגובה ,12 אם לא הבנת, גילופין זה ליד עין עורדין, שזה 5 ק"מ דרומית לצומת מסובין, שכולן נמצאות מעבר לקו הירוק. ולמה מלכלכין על ראשון? כי בחג הזה כולנו ראשונין....

ועל זה גולדה מאיר היתה אומרת:

Palestinian infighting 'especially brutal'

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GAZA CITY — Gunmen opened fire Monday at the Palestinian cabinet building while the government was meeting inside, officials said. There were no reports of injuries.

An official in Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh's office said the gunfire didn't disturb the cabinet meeting and that officials were trying to pin down the source of fire. The official spoke on condition of anonymity because he was not authorized to speak to the media.

Palestinian security and witnesses said rival Hamas and Fatah forces were exchanging fire from neighbouring high-rise buildings.

Earlier Monday gunmen fired at Haniyeh's house and attacked the offices of the Hamas-run Culture Ministry, as Palestinians sought in vain to quell the flare-up in internal violence.

The new fighting between the Fatah and Hamas movements, which broke out over the weekend, has been especially brutal. The attack on Haniyeh's home came shortly after two militants were dragged onto the roofs of Gaza high-rises and thrown to their deaths.

There were no immediate reports of casualties in the attack on Haniyeh's house in the Shati refugee camp next to Gaza City. It was the first time in a month of infighting that Haniyeh was an apparent target, underlining an escalation in tactics by the warring sides.

In an especially grisly incident Sunday, Hamas militants kidnapped an officer in a Fatah-linked security force, took him to the roof of a 15-storey apartment building and threw him off. Mohammed Sweirki, 25, from the guard of Palestinian Authority Present Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah, was killed in the plunge.

That set off skirmishes through the city, including gun battles and shelling. Fatah militants surrounded the house of a Hamas mosque preacher, fired rocket-propelled grenades at the four-storey building and then entered, firing at the preacher, Mohammed al-Rifati, 40, and taking him away. Later, his body was brought to a hospital. Hamas pledged revenge.

And just before midnight, a Hamas activist was thrown off the 12th floor of a building and killed, security officials said. Four other Hamas men in the building were shot and wounded, bringing the day's toll to three dead and 36 wounded, medical officials said.

Palestinian TV reported that Haniyeh called on gunmen to pull back from streets and rooftops to allow about 24,000 Gaza high school students to start their final exams, which were scheduled for Monday.

On Sunday, Israeli political and military leaders pledged to keep up the pressure on Gaza after a cross-border raid by Palestinian militants, a failed attempt to capture an Israel Defence Forces soldier.

Israel responded with a flurry of air strikes, and Prime Minister Ehud Olmert told his cabinet that there was more to come. "I said a week ago that our operations in Gaza will continue as long as it takes to block the terrorists' attempts to infiltrate and the Qassam rockets," he said.

Israel Defence Forces Chief of Staff Gabi Ashkenazi, favours more intensive military activity in Gaza, but stopping short of a full-scale invasion, defence officials said Sunday.

The Saturday cross-border raid was another step up the ladder of the conflict. Four Islamic Jihad gunmen breached the heavily fortified Gaza-Israel border and entered an empty army base, looking for soldiers to abduct. Israeli forces encountered them, killing one. The other three escaped back to Gaza.

Lauder elected head of WJC

By JACOB BERKMAN
JTA

NEW YORK — With the election of Ronald Lauder as its interim president, the World Jewish Congress is hoping to put aside years of turmoil from political infighting and allegations of financial mismanagement.

Lauder, the president of the Jewish National Fund, defeated Mendel Kaplan, 59-17, in a vote Sunday of the organization's board of governors. Earlier in the day, the WJC executive committee had voted 11-4 to recommend Lauder to the board.

Lauder succeeds Edgar Bronfman, who retired after serving nearly 30 years as president. The board of governors overwhelmingly voted in Bronfman's son, Matthew, as its chair. Matthew Bronfman, the chairman of the WJC's finance committee, was running as part of a ticket with Lauder and was unopposed.

Also Sunday, the WJC's secretary-general, Stephen Herbits, said in a report to the governing board that he would resign if Lauder and Bronfman were chosen.

The WJC is best known for securing billions in Holocaust restitution funds and fighting anti-Semitism. But its reputation has suffered as a result of the turmoil of the past several years.

In March it fired its longtime powerbroker, Rabbi Israel Singer, amid accusations of financial improprieties.

Edgar Bronfman alleged that Rabbi Singer, who had held top positions in the WJC for three decades, had taken money without proper authorization or documentation. Rabbi Singer denied the charges.

Insiders had said they were looking toward ending that chapter of the organization and refocusing its energies on issues such as Iran and anti-Semitism.

Lauder defeated Kaplan, a South African steel magnate who was chairman of the WJC executive. Also in the race were Einat Wilf, an Israeli activist and writer, and Vladimir Herzberg, a Russian-Israeli nuclear physicist. Only Herzberg was not in attendance at the vote. Wilf withdrew her candidacy after giving a speech to the governing board.

The interim president will serve until 2009, when the WJC holds its next plenary and selects a permanent president.

Iran threatens 'missile blitz' against Gulf states

By YOSSI MELMAN
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Iran threatened Monday to launch a missile blitz against Persian Gulf states that would drag the entire Middle East into a war, should the United States strike its nuclear facilities.

"The objective will be to stun the American missile defence system using dozens if not hundreds of missiles that will be launched simultaneously at certain targets," Iran's former defence minister, Admiral Ali Shamkhani, told the U.S. journal Defense News.

Qatar, Bahrain, and Oman all host key U.S. and British military bases, and Shamkhani's comments were rare for a senior Iranian official in that they were directed at Gulf states and not Israel.

Shamkhani directed his comments primarily at states that co-operate with the United States, adding that the missiles would be fired not only at the American bases, but also at strategic facilities such as oil refineries and power stations.

To date, it was widely believed that the brunt of any Iranian retaliation for an attack on its nuclear facilities would be directed at Israel. Experts who have been closely following developments in Iran believe, however, that an Iranian attack on Saudi Arabia is not entirely out of the question.

This is one of the few times a senior Iranian official has spoken in such detail about Iran's potential response to an attack on its nuclear facilities.

Anti-Semitism in Western Europe 'out of control'

By DINAH A. SPRITZER
JTA

PRAGUE — A young French Jew is kidnapped, tortured and left to die by a band of Muslims. An arson badly damages Geneva's largest synagogue. A 13-year-old girl on a London bus is robbed and kicked unconscious after her attackers ask if she is "Jewish or English."

That is the consensus of a dizzying array of recent reports, the latest of which was released last week at a conference combating discrimination under the auspices of the Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE).

Representatives of dozens of European governments were expected at the June 7-9 meeting in Bucharest, Romania, a followup to a 2005 conference of the OSCE conference on anti-Semitism in Spain.

The 2007 Hate Crimes Survey by the U.S.-based organization Human Rights First goes beyond the data included in many of the studies to suggest that most European governments are woefully inept at measuring and thus prosecuting hate crimes.

Human Rights First says the survey is the first by a U.S. non-governmental organization to examine racist, xenophobic, homophobic and anti-religious crimes in Europe.

It is also the only one of the recent reports to raise the spectre of a Europe teetering on the verge of a Hitler-era epidemic of racist hatred.

"Today the parallels with the 1930s include the seeming indifference of many governments and broad sectors of public opinion to the rising violence and fear that once again threatens European Jews, and with them members of other minorities," says a separate, companion report that focuses exclusively on anti-Semitism."

In most European countries, "anti-Semitic violence and other hate crimes still are largely unacknowledged in public policy and action," according to the survey by Human Rights First.

Paul LeGendre, who directs the anti-discrimination program for Human Rights First, told reporters from the group's New York office, "One of our findings is that governments are not doing enough to report on hate crimes. We have a sizable data deficit."

The companion survey says that the data that has been collected "reveals both a general trend toward a rise in anti-Semitic incidents and a trend toward violent crimes against Jewish people in a growing proportion of such incidents."

Many Jews are also protesting anti-Semitism they say is disguised as criticism of Israel throughout Western Europe. The latest examples come from Britain: the proposed boycott of Israeli academics, which the largest British teachers union voted last month to disseminate to its membership for a final decision, and the country's largest trade union, with more than a million members, deciding to consider a boycott motion on Israel at its upcoming conference.

The picture, however, may be more complicated as anti-Israel and anti-American sentiment have spilled over into what some hope are only cyclical rises in hostility based on world events and not on actual antipathy to Jews.

But others argue that anti-Israel and anti-Jewish behavior have become indistinguishable.

In an Anti-Defamation League survey on European attitudes toward Jews released in early May, 51 per cent of respondents in five countries said Jews are more loyal to Israel than to their home country, and 52 per cent said Israel's actions have lowered their views of Jews.

A European Jewish Congress report issued last November revealed a dramatic rise in anti-Israel discourse during the Lebanon War both among leftist politicians and media in Europe, as well as on the extreme right. The discourse, the report said, often morphed into anti-Jewish sentiment.

For Ilan Moss, author of the report, this trend was illustrated best when someone anonymously laminated a Guardian newspaper photo of victims from the Israeli airstrike in Qana that killed 28, including 16 children, and taped it to the front of a London synagogue.

Canada backs OSCE on anti-Semitism

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Organization for Security and Co-operation in Europe (OSCE) has appointed a special representative on combating anti-Semitism and resisted efforts to include the hatred of Jews as only one among many forms of bigotry that ought to be addressed.

In its "Bucharest Declaration" issued last week, the OSCE condemned all forms of racism, discrimination and "aggressive nationalism" but also stated: "Recognizing its unique and historic character, condemn anti-Semitism without reservation, whether expressed in a traditional manner or through new forms and manifestations."

The OSCE went on to "reiterate previous OSCE declarations that international developments or political issues, including in Israel or anywhere else, can never justify anti-Semitism."

Canada supported the appointment of a personal representative to the OSCE's chair to report on anti-Semitism and the continuation of OSCE policy to recognize prejudice against Jews as a unique phenomenon.

Jason Kenney, Secretary of State for Multiculturalism and Canadian Identity, headed the Canadian delegation at the OSCE meeting in Romania. Although he was unavailable for comment, his office made available his statement to the conference.

In it Kenney said, "I would like to emphasize that international developments remind us that anti-Semitism is a particularly pernicious and durable form of hatred. Recognition of this fact should in no way derogate from combating other forms of hatred and intolerance.

"Canada believes the OSCE should maintain a focus on combating anti-Semitism, in part by maintaining three personal representatives of the chairman-in-office, particularly the representative on anti-Semitism."

Kenny also noted that Canada is developing a national data-collection strategy on hate crimes and linking police in various jurisdictions to better address the problem.

Len Rudner, director of community relations for Canadian Jewish Congress, highlighted the links between Holocaust denial, anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism.

In our time, denial of the Holocaust – and its concomitant demonization of Jews – is accompanied by the demonization of the State of Israel, he said.

"Has any state been so often the focus of Nazi analogies? Has any other state been so readily targeted with the slur of apartheid? Let us be clear, such analogies constitute a form of anti-Semitism."

David Matas, senior legal counsel for B'nai Brith Canada, urged the organization to maintain specialized monitoring of anti-Semitic incidents.

"We can see across the OSCE territory a large number of racist incidents which are anti-Semitic," he said. "In many of these countries, anti-Semitism is far and away the leading form of racism, the most vicious, as well as the oldest. The disproportionate size of anti-Semitism is sometimes disguised by failure to report or to recognize the anti-Semitism which is anti-Zionism. Once that disguise is dropped, the dimensions of the problem are plain.

"Because of anti-Zionist efforts to bury the struggle against anti-Semitism, any initiative to subsume the struggle against anti-Semitism within a more general effort to combat racial and religious intolerance creates the risk that the OSCE initiative against anti-Semitism will disappear entirely despite the dimensions of the problem," he stated.

"Advocates of a holistic approach to combat racial and religious intolerance within the OSCE are unresponsive to the special threats which the struggle against anti-Semitism faces. These advocates are laying the groundwork for the disappearance of anti-Semitism from the OSCE radar screen, for unravelling the notable achievements of the OSCE in confronting anti-Semitism. Combating racial intolerance means recognizing the unique nature of anti-Semitism and rejection of this holistic approach."

The Bucharest Declaration, which called on OSCE countries to find effective ways to promote mutual respect, understanding and equality, followed the 2005 Cordoba Conference on Anti-Semitism and other forms of Intolerance.

Mass grave found in Ukraine

JTA

ODESSA — A mass grave holding the remains of thousands of Jews killed by the Nazis has been found in southern Ukraine.

Workers laying gas pipelines near Odessa accidentally found the grave last month. It's near a former concentration camp where 5,000 Jews were killed, Associated Press reported.

Roman Shvartsman, a spokesperson for the regional Jewish community, estimated that Nazis killed 240,000 Jews in the Odessa region.

The director of the Ukrainian Center for Holocaust Studies, Anatoly Podolsky, said there were approximately 250 to 300 mass graves in Ukraine of Nazi victims, and some of them have yet to be discovered. The Nazis killed a total of 1.5 million Jews in Ukraine during the Holocaust.

Prague Document supports dissidents in 'fear societies'

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

MP Irwin Cotler has attended many international gatherings on human rights and found many of them dominated by delegates bashing Israel. But after returning from the Democracy & Security conference in Prague last week, he was gratified by the "refreshing" absence of the usual anti-Israel venom.

Instead, participants focused on the topic at hand – how best to promote the development of free societies and human rights where tyranny now exists – and came up with a 10-point action plan that was adopted by all participants.

The "Prague Document" calls on governments and individuals in the free world to help those living in "societies ruled by fear and repression."

The action plan includes: demands for the release of non-violent political prisoners; meetings by diplomats from free countries with political prisoners and dissidents; raising public awareness of the issue; raising human rights in meetings with officials of non-democratic regimes; applying the principles of the Helsinki Accords to link bilateral and international relations to human rights; isolating and ostracizing governments and groups that suppress peaceful domestic opponents; and providing incentives to those willing to improve human rights and democratize.

Another principle in the Prague Document was "isolating and ostracizing governments and groups that threaten other countries and peoples with genocide or annihilation."

Cotler, Canada's former justice minister, said he would ask the Harper government to implement the 10 points.

The two-day conference was hosted by former Czech prime minister Vaclav Havel, former Spanish prime minister José Maria Aznar and Refusenik and one-time Israeli Knesset member Natan Sharansky, who represented the Adelson Institute for Strategic Studies at the Shalem Center. Participants included human rights advocates, academics, politicians and journalists. U.S. President George Bush addressed the conference one day before attending the G-8 Summit in Germany.

Cotler, who has represented a number of political dissidents including Sharansky and South Africa's Nelson Mandela, said the participants included many "profiles in courage." Dissidents from repressive regimes in Syria, Egypt, Lebanon, the Palestinian Authority, Iraq, Saudi Arabia, Libya and Iran participated and their presentations were "moving in the bearing of witness."

The conference helped convey to those dissidents they are not alone. "The cause of liberty is really a universal cause that united dissidents in that common cause," Cotler said.

Panelists discussed a number of topics, including democracy and security, how best to make the transition from tyranny to democracy and whether the democratization process has reached an impasse. David Bercuson, director of programs at the Canadian Defence & Foreign Affairs Institute, the only other Canadian at the conference, participated in a panel on the role of democratic states, international institutions and the media in the global security environment.

Cotler said democracy, freedom and the dignity of the individual are principles that all peoples aspire to. He answered the question about the links of democracy and security by noting the repression and corruption of Egypt's Mubarak government that led to the growth of the Muslim Brotherhood while a similar situation in Yasser Arafat's Palestinian Authority led to the popularity of Hamas.

Cotler said he will push for the creation of a "global law firm" that he dubbed "Dissident Democracy International" that will provide legal services to dissidents while advancing the cause of democracy. He also suggested employing the Helsinki model to press "fear societies" to change. Democracies ought not to coddle dictators but confront them and support dissidents while linking trade and good relations to improvement in human rights, he said.

Burg turns back on Zion?

A former Knesset speaker and Jewish Agency head drew fire for comments construed as anti-Zionist. Avraham Burg, an Orthodox left-winger who has spent most of his career in Israeli politics, described the Jewish state as a lost cause in a newspaper interview. "To define the State of Israel as a Jewish state is the key to its end," Burg, 52, told Ha'aretz. "Judaism always prepared alternatives," he said. "The strategic mistake of Zionism was to annul the alternatives. Israeliness has only body. It doesn't have soul." The interview was aimed at promoting a new Burg memoir titled Defeating Hitler, which Ha'aretz called a book of "mourning for the loss of Israel." Burg's comments drew fire in the Knesset, which he quit in 2004 in protest of his Labor Party's plan to join then-prime minister Ariel Sharon's coalition.

Leaders' summit postponed

A planned meeting between Ehud Olmert and Mahmoud Abbas was postponed indefinitely. The Israeli prime minister and Palestinian Authority president were to have met last Thursday in Jericho, the latest in regular bilateral talks instigated by U.S. Secretary of State Condoleezza Rice. But Abbas' aides said the summit was cancelled amid PA anger at Israel's refusal to discuss declaring a comprehensive truce in the West Bank and Gaza. No new date or venue were immediately given.

A Hebrew University of Jerusalem researcher may have found the cure for obesity. The university said that Yaniv Linde, 32, a doctoral student in its department of organic chemistry, developed a compound that mimics the activity of the naturally occurring MSH hormone, which is secreted during eating. When the hormone binds to a receptor in the brain called MC4R, the brain signals to the rest of the body that it feels full, the university said. The compound has been patented in Europe and the United States. The Israeli company Bioline Rx Ltd. bought the development rights from the school and is now working on creating an anti-obesity drug. –Files from JTA

By MOSHE ARENS

Opinion

In the early years of its existence Israel was unable to deter its enemies from launching attacks against it – they perceived it as too weak and consequently the state became the victim of successive Arab attacks.

In their view, the balance of power between Israel and the Arab world made it appear possible that Arab strength was sufficient to decisively defeat Israel in a military confrontation and thereby put an end to its existence. They felt that if they were not successful the first time round, they had good reason to try again.

This was still the case after Israel's dramatic victory in the 1967 Six-Day War, the third round of Arab-Israel military confrontation, which was followed by the three "nos" of the Arab League meeting in Khartoum and by the Egyptian war of attrition, launched shortly after the country was defeated by Israel.

It was only after its victory in the Yom Kippur War that Israel attained a substantial deterrent power. Having attacked Israel under seemingly optimal conditions, simultaneously from north and south, and catching it by surprise, the Arab states were surprised to find the Israel Defence Forces 101 kilometres from Cairo and within artillery range of Damascus after three weeks of fighting.

This victory was proof enough that the Arab armies did not have the capability to defeat Israel on the battlefield. "Victory" celebrations, held in Egypt after the war, sufficed for public relations purposes, and even today visitors are still taken to Cairo's "victory museum." But the truth hit home where it mattered the most – at the decision-making level. Israel's deterrent power, the result of the IDF's 1973 victory, lasted almost 35 years.

It began to lose some of its effectiveness only after the Second Lebanon War, as demonstrated by the recent Syrian rhetoric – the type of which has not been heard since the end of the Yom Kippur War – concerning the possibility of war with Israel if peace is not achieved.

But during the last few years, far more than Israel's deterrent power against possible aggression by Arab armies has been called into question.

Whereas Israel has never been able to deter terrorist organizations from attacking Israeli civilians, for the simple reason that terrorists, by their nature, cannot be deterred, during recent years, Israel itself has been deterred from acting, fearing the terrorist response to Israeli anti-terrorist moves.

Have the tables been turned? Is Israel now the one being deterred from taking actions against its enemies in defence of its interests, and in particular, in defence of its civilian population, rather than succeeding in deterring its enemies, as was the case in the past?

Terrorists cannot be deterred. Their specific location is usually unknown, and punitive blows directed at the public that supports them tend to be counterproductive by creating additional support and sympathy for the terrorists throughout the world. Terrorists have to be fought.

Contrary to the oft-repeated, inane slogan that terrorism cannot be defeated by force, in the period between 2002 and 2005, the IDF and Israel's security services illustrated that terrorists can be fought effectively and can even be defeated. As Israel's experience in Judea and Samaria has shown during those years, it requires the presence of forces on the ground – it cannot be accomplished by remote control.

The situation is exactly the reverse when the fight against the terrorists is conducted from a distance, as was the case with Hezbollah in southern Lebanon after the unilateral Israeli retreat from the security zone in 2000, and as is currently the case in the Gaza Strip after the disengagement.

But worse yet, in the absence of forces on the ground, the terrorists are able to amass an arsenal of rockets capable of hitting civilian targets in Israel, while they themselves hunker down in bunkers and fortifications that are likely to make a return to these areas by the IDF both difficult and costly.

In other words, the terrorists have now achieved a deterrent capability, and the anti-terrorist forces are wary of tangling with them. Thus, Israel was deterred from going after Hezbollah after the withdrawal from southern Lebanon, despite the dire warnings issued by then Israeli prime minster Ehud Barak concerning the reprisals that would follow any Hezbollah provocations. In the same manner, Hamas now deters Israel from going after its fighters in Gaza, despite the daily rocketing of Sderot. A sovereign country cannot permit this kind of imbalance to maintain for any amount of time without suffering severe damage.

Elena Miro redefines plus size dressing, sets precedent at Milano Moda Donna

A visit to Elena Miro doesn't just change your outlook on plus-size shopping, it redefines it completely.

A fashion oasis amid a host of dispiriting plus-size alternatives, Elena Miro encourages you not merely to accept your plus-size status and stature, but to embrace it.

Impossible, you say? Milano Moda Donna begs to differ. In October 2005 Elena Miro became the first plus-size brand to grace the catwalk at this industry-leading ladies' fashion trade show, viewable locally on the Telelatino Network (Channel 35).

First plus size to grace runway at Moda Donna

Gone forever are the days of having to "settle" for looking anything less than your best. This is high fashion that just happens to come in plus sizes.

Evolving from a small family business into a vertically integrated clothing empire, the Elena Miro collection has spawned signature boutiques around the world, including all the major fashion capitals like London, Paris, and Milan. The opening of its two Toronto stores brings this symphony of style to your doorstep.

Conveniently located in Bayview Village (uptown) and Yorkville (downtown), Elena Miro offers enough sophistication and pizzazz to inspire "plus-size envy" among your smaller-size friends and colleagues. Suddenly, their "perfect" bodies don't seem so perfect any more. Suddenly, you're happy being exactly who you are. Suddenly, you no longer care if you can't shop at "their" stores: they can't shop at Elena Miro.

From casual wear to career wear, the Elena Miro line offers a multitude of choices in a cornucopia of fashion colours. The spring / summer collection features six strong groupings that afford a myriad of mix-and-match possibilities. Buy a skirt, and you'll have at least three viable options in matching or complementary slacks; ditto for jackets and blouses.

Navy and white is prominent for summer, as are red and black, taupe and black, lime green and navy, beige and orange. The fabrics are top drawer, with cool cottons and crisp linens offering comfort and breathability.

Each piece features the kind of painstaking construction, subtle design nuances and impeccable finish you'd expect in a made-in-Italy designer garment, let alone ready-to-wear. The prices are surprisingly affordable for this level of quality. And the detailing! — we found blouses with more style in a single button than some entire outfits we'd seen elsewhere! If you've been disappointed in other larger-size options to date, the Elena Miro collection will be a breathe of fresh air.

During their 35 years in retail fashion, owners Joseph and Lea Lugassy have had many opportunities to open a plus-size shop, but Elena Miro was the first collection to really knock their socks off. "We weren't interested in opening just another plus store where women could 'make do'," says Joseph. "Why should they have to compromise on style? This was the first plus line we saw that spoke to us. It has "High Fashion" written all over it. If you didn't check the labels, you'd never know they're plus sizes." Adds Lea, "Do you want people to say, 'Nice outfit', or, 'WOW! That's beautiful!?' Elena Miro has the 'Wow' factor."

Garments modelled by real women like you

Bringing a little slice of Milan to Toronto, the Elena Miro boutiques follow a corporate design template that, like the clothing, is style itself. In structure and decor they're typically Italian: all content, no clutter. In addition to esthetic appeal, four panoramically-arrayed big-screen monitors offer a huge practical advantage. As you shop, you can see virtually every garment on the premises being modelled at Moda Donna by women shaped just like you. Real women. How they look in Elena Miro is how you will look. In fact, that could very well be you up on the runway.

So once you've decked yourself out to the nines at Elena Miro, hold your breath when your phone rings; it could be Milano Moda Donna calling.

Teen cancer researcher wins award

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Although he's still just 15, Winnipeg Jewish high school student Yale Michaels is attracting international attention for his efforts in cancer research.

For the second year in a row, the Grade 10 student's research has won him a trip to the Intel International Science and Engineering Fair in Albuquerque, N.M, and several cash prizes.

This year's fair took place from May 21 to 28 in Albuquerque. There were about 1,500 students from 40 countries (including 15 other Canadian students) competing for $4 million (US) in prize money and scholarships.

Michaels' work – focusing on creating a cost-effective alternative to conventional cancer therapy by using a probing system capable of detecting cancer at the molecular level – placed second in the health and medicine category. He also won the American Dental Association research prize (he notes that his research is not dental-related, but the ADA's criteria were broad).

The two awards were worth a total of $3,500 (US).

Last year, he came home from the fair with $1,500 (US). In total, his research has earned him about $17,000 from various competitions.

In Albuquerque, Michaels, a student at Winnipeg's Grant Park High School, also enjoyed the opportunity to meet several Nobel Prize winners as well as other high school scientists, and to attend a variety of workshops.

Michaels' grandfather, Leon Michaels, now retired, is a British-born and trained cardiologist and author of a book on heart disease. (His parents, John and Karen Michaels, are both lawyers.)

Yale Michaels began his cancer research three years ago. He has been welcomed into the Manitoba Institute of Cell Biology lab at CancerCare Manitoba, where he has been able to work with professional research scientists.

His first project had to do with gap junctions and brain tumours. Dr. David Aisenstat was his supervisor in that research.

His current project, under the supervision of Dr. Geoff Hicks, is an effort to design a detection system that would indicate cancer by changes in colour in a cell sample and lead to treatment that would recognize the cancer cells and only attack those cells.

"I have produced the colour change," he said, "but haven't been able to connect it to a detection system yet."

Michaels would like eventually to become a researcher or doctor.

For next fall though, he is looking forward to trying out for his high school football team, in addition to pursuing his scientific research. He said that next year he may revisit his earlier research under Aisenstat's supervision.

Michaels adds that the only disappointing aspect of his trip this year to Albuquerque was that it rained a lot.

"Albuquerque is in the desert!" he said.

Golf tournament to raise funds for cancer research

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The seventh annual Woodchuck Golf Classic – in memory of Charles Krowitz, who died in 2000 at age 30 from Burkitt's lymphoma – is set for July 11 at Deer Creek Golf and Banquet Facility in Ajax, Ont.

Funds raised from the event organized by his friends and family – they have raised $400,000 from the past six tournaments – will go to the Charles Krowitz Burkitt's Lymphoma Research Fund at Princess Margaret Hospital.

The money will be used to improve diagnosis of the disease, a highly aggressive lymphoma that affects people of all ages, and to identify new drugs and drug targets for Burkitt cells that either reduce the toxicity of current therapies or improve the outcome for patients if the disease recurs.

Krowitz, who had a wife and eight-month-old son at the time of his death, was diagnosed in November 1999. Despite aggressive chemotherapy treatment, he died six months later.

After his death, his family asked that people contribute to a fund established in his memory for cancer research, and more than $10,000 was raised at that time.

Subsequently, the current fund was set up, said his mother Penny, "so that other families are not faced with this devastating loss. Our philosophy is to raise money for one family at a time."

For information on the tournament visit www.charleskrowitzgolf.com, or call Penny Krowitz at 905-889-0210 or Elda Sparaga at 416-787-0133.

A journey from dentistry to comedy

By SHERI SHEFA
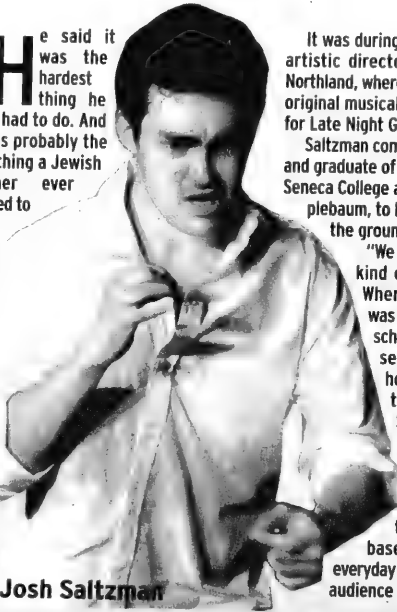
Staff Reporter



Josh Saltzman

He said it was the hardest thing he ever had to do. And it was probably the last thing a Jewish mother ever wanted to hear.

Four years ago, Josh Saltzman confronted his parents with the news that he was going to abandon his plans to go to dentistry school to fulfil his dream of becoming a comedian.

Saltzman, 25, is now the creative force behind Late Night Giggin, a Toronto-based comedy troupe that performs every fourth Wednesday of the month at the Brunswick House, a pub in the Annex.

Although the Thornhill native is enjoying the success of his 2½-year-old project, it wasn't easy to make the transition from a steady future of cleaning teeth to the cruel world of showbiz.

Saltzman was nearing the end of the third year of his four-year sciences program at the University of Western Ontario (UWO) when he decided that he just couldn't do it anymore.

"Every night I would dream about going on Saturday Night Live or being a performer. I had to do it. There was no other option. Worst mistake of my life," he joked.

He left UWO for Humber College in 2003, where he took the comedy writing and performance program.

It was during his four-year stint as the artistic director at B'nai Brith's Camp Northland, where he would write and direct original musicals and plays, that the idea for Late Night Giggin came into being.

Saltzman commissioned his camp friend and graduate of the marketing program at Seneca College at York University, Dori Applebaum, to help him get his troupe off the ground and produce the shows.

"We created it together and it's kind of like a small business. When we first started out, it was just a few of my camp and schools friends coming out to see it, but now it's packed houses, 200 people coming to see the show," said Saltzman, who is often compared to the legendary comedian John Belushi.

He said that he tends to write sketches based on experiences in his everyday life, making it easy for his audience to relate to.

For instance, he recalled travelling to Montreal to perform with "The Cast," the name of Late Night Giggin's seven-person comedy troupe, and they all stayed in one hotel room.

"At 5 o'clock in the morning, there was this pigeon outside our window that just kept crying," he said, emitting a pathetic coo that, well, sounded like a crying pigeon. "The more we would yell at it to shut up, the more it would cry, so we're going to do that on stage. It might be weird to have someone dressed up as a pigeon on stage, but whatever."

Saltzman said he also relies on his family to provide him with material.

"My grandmother steals milk packets all the time. I think it's hilarious. I don't know why, but she always steals milk packets. You can go to Kiva's [a kosher-style restaurant in Thornhill] and look around. It's not just my grandmother. Every little old lady is taking the creams, the sugars."

In an attempt to get his name out there in any way he can, Saltzman has also teamed up with Josh Shultz, an actor who graduated from Concordia University's film production program, to found Shultzman Films.

Together with their cameraman Rob Chodos, Shultz and Saltzman post short comedy films on YouTube and shultzmanfilms.com, which run the gamut from a scientist who is peer pressured into dunking his hand into a beaker full of acid, to an annoying roommate who won't let his roommate's friend study.

Saltzman, who also does standup at comedy clubs including the Laugh Resort and Yuk Yuks, is forced to ride the ups and downs of the Toronto comedy scene.

"I go home some nights if I have a bad set, where the audience is just staring at me and you want to just quit, but you can't. At the same time, the next day you have a really good set and you go home with your arm hanging out the window of your car, music blaring, thinking, 'I'm going to be a star.' Everyday is different.".

Saltzman, who feels he has yet to define his style but describes his sense of humour as dramatic, energetic, and physical, says that while it takes weeks for him and The Cast to produce a show, they make sure not to over-rehearse.

"We focus more on writing it really well. I like it when it doesn't look so polished, I like it when it's a little wild and raw. The audience can tell that we're scared, and we don't know what's going to happen and the craziest stuff happens on stage all the time."

Although his stage fright is so bad that he nearly vomits before a show, Saltzman said that nothing compares to the adrenaline rush of performing live.

"It's one of the most euphoric experiences. It's a rush of pure pleasure that you're making all these people laugh, it's like nothing else in the world."

But it's tough to make a living as an entertainer, especially in Canada, he said.

"I'd love to get a job writing for a TV show in Canada. I really don't want to have to go down to the States. Sometimes it feels like there is no other way."

"I have very big dreams. It's a very hard lifestyle, but it's the best and I don't plan on moving out of my parents' house anytime soon."

For more information about Late Night Giggin, visit www.myspace.com/latenightgiggin.

Soviet war-mongering sparked the Six Day War

Foxbats Over Dimona: The Soviets' Nuclear Gamble in the Six Day War*, by Isabella Ginor and Gideon Remez, Yale University Press

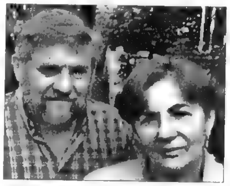
By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It's common knowledge that the Soviet Union had a direct hand in touching off the Six Day War.

Moscow cynically claimed that Israel had aggressive designs on Syria and had massed troops on the Syrian border for that purpose.

When Israel's prime minister, Levi Eshkol, invited the Soviet ambassador, Dmitri Chuvakhin, to accompany him to northern Galilee to verify his claim, he declined.

Yet the damage was already done.



Gideon Remez and Isabella Ginor

Egypt, having internalized Moscow's misinformation, placed its army on a war footing, ordered the United Nations peacekeeping force out of the Sinai Peninsula and closed the Straits of Tiran to Israeli shipping, thereby provoking Israel to attack Egypt on that fateful morning of June 5, 1967. This is the conventional narrative of the causes of the war, the 40th anniversary of which was marked last week.

But according to Israeli journalists Isabella Ginor and Gideon Remez, the Soviet Union played more of a pernicious role in war-mongering than had been previously disclosed.

In Foxbats Over Dimona: The Soviets' Nuclear Gamble in the Six Day War (Yale University Press), they contend that Moscow, in an attempt to wipe out Israel's nuclear arsenal, deliberately instigated the crisis that led to the war and was prepared to intervene militarily in pursuit of its objective.

Based on newly available documents and testimonies from former Soviet military personnel, and cross-checked against Israeli and Western sources, Foxbats Over Dimona is an audaciously revisionist work.

Its thesis, though plausible, may yet be challenged. But for now, Foxbats Over Dimona makes for absorbing reading. At the heart of the book is the assertion that the Soviet Union, a staunch Arab ally, devised a convoluted plan of Machiavellian proportions to provoke Israel into striking Egypt and Syria pre-emptively.

Moscow's reasoning was that if Israel's Dimona reactor could be destroyed, Israel would fall short of achieving even a semblance of nuclear superiority over its Arab clients. In turn, this would reinforce their dependence on the Soviet Union, in gratitude for having destroyed Dimona.

In line with this scheme, Moscow sent advanced MiG-25 Foxbat jets over Israel's nuclear complex in a bid to provoke Israel, and it readied a naval force for a marine landing in Haifa. Although the amphibious operation was actually set into motion, it was finally aborted due to Israel's swift victory in the war.

In planning this bold campaign, Moscow took its cue from the Egyptian president, Gamal Abdel Nasser, who threatened to go to war with Israel if it developed or was close to developing a nuclear capability.

At a meeting with Israeli foreign ministry officials about a year before the war, the Soviet envoy warned Israel that its acquisition of an atomic bomb would be "very dangerous."

To allay such concerns, Eshkol, in a speech to the Knesset, denied that Israel had nuclear arms and pledged that it would not be the first "to introduce such weapons into our area."

Clearly, Israel feared the prospect of Soviet intervention, though the Soviet Union was the first country to recognize Israel on a de jure basis and believed that Israel's existence was more beneficial for spreading its influence in the Middle East than its disappearance.

But as Ginor and Remez observe, after the mid-1950s, Moscow considered the 1947 partition lines to be Israel's legitimate borders. They also claim that the goal of eradicating Israel, while never stated as official policy, was widespread in Soviet military circles.

Ginor and Remez say that direct Soviet military intervention began in mid-May with overflights of Israel's main nuclear facility in Dimona.

On May 17, two Foxbats flown by the Soviet Union's best pilots made an unprecedented photo-reconnaissance flight over southern Israel, sweeping over Dimona. For each of the sorties, the MiG-25s were flown by another pilot from Yemen to an Egyptian base and refuelled for the flight into Israel.

One of the pilots, Aleksandr Vyboronov, who was decorated for carrying out the mission, said that Israeli aircraft tried but failed to intercept him.

Turning to the proposed naval landings in Israel, the authors say that about 1,000 Soviet commandos were assembled for attacks against Israeli naval headquarters in the port of Haifa.

The purpose of the seemingly harebrained mission was to sow havoc and confusion and divert Israeli soldiers from the front lines. It was cancelled at the last moment, with a Soviet frigate only about 30 kilometres from Haifa.

Although Moscow scrubbed its elaborate plan to intervene in the war on a massive scale, Soviet military and civilian advisors were active in helping Syria fortify the Golan Heights.

The U.S. embassy in Damascus estimated that some 160 Soviet advisors were seconded to the Syrian ministry of defence. But as Ginor and Remez note, the Soviets themselves admitted that the real number was 400.

Indeed, Soviet advisors were embedded with a Syrian infantry company that attempted to storm Kibbutz Dan on June 6. As they put it, "The small [Israeli] force at the Tel Dan outpost could hear Russian-language communications on the attacking force's radio system."

Fearing the wrath of the Soviets, the Israeli defence minister, Moshe Dayan, hesitated before launching an invasion of the Golan several days later.

It took Israel only about 24 hours to conquer the rocky plateau, and during the course of its offensive, five Soviet officers attached to a Syrian artillery unit were allegedly captured. Neither Israel nor the Soviet Union would confirm or deny the story, which was attributed to the Associated Press.

As Ginor and Remez suggest, the monumental Arab defeat in the Six Day War prompted the Soviet Union to upgrade its presence in the Middle East.

Moscow acquired permanent naval bases in Egypt and Syria, and at the height of the War of Attrition, which broke out almost immediately after the Six Day War, the Soviet expeditionary force in Egypt consisted of no fewer than 20,000 advisors, including MiG-21 fighter squadrons.

Strangely enough, Ginor and Remez omit the fact that the Israeli Air Force shot down several Soviet-piloted MiGs in a 1970 dogfight over the Sinai.

In concluding, they state that Soviet support for the Arabs in the post-Six-Day War period was limited to reversing Arab territorial losses incurred in 1967. Moscow had no intention of trying to destroy Israel.

In a reference to the Arab-Israeli conflict, he said, "As long as hostility dominates in the Middle East, we are needed there."

Gromyko certainly had a keen appreciation of Middle East realities.

Veteran Broadway performer in Stage West's Full Monty

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

Mary Ellen Ashley has been acting, singing and dancing since she made her debut on Broadway in the New York Theater Guild's production of the Innocent Voyage. While still a youngster, the Manhattan-born-and-raised thespian was cast in the original production of Annie Get Your Gun, which starred Broadway legend Ethel Merman.

Ashley is kicking up her heels and a whole lot more in a Broadway musical based on the British film The Full Monty, at Mississauga's Stage West Theatre until July 8.

Ashley played Jeanette last year in a Boston production of The Full Monty, a role she reprises in the Toronto production. Unlike others who have played Jeanette, with their feet firmly planted on the ground, Ashley's Jeanette, in a dance move, is raised over the heads of the males in the cast. Not too shabby for a woman who admits to being 60-plus.

Ashley says her experience working in Toronto has been lovely. She was offered the role of Jeanette in an Arkansas production, but opted for the Great White North instead.

"Jeanette is a kind of mother earth. Jeanette was in show business, she was a piano player with big-name old-time jazz groups and bands like Stan Kenton. She retires with her husband, then heard about the show being formed – not knowing what the show was going to be except that it was going to feature a bunch of factory workers," Ashley says.

"She gets wind of that and gets the urge to go back into the business, play the piano and help put on this show, where the factory workers decide to do a striptease," she says.

To put a Canadian slant on the production, Stage West's The Full Monty takes place in Hamilton, Ont., during the recession of the 1980s.

This is Ashley's second time working in the Greater Toronto Area. She appeared in Royal Alexandra Theatre's production of Tintypes in the late 1980s. Besides performing in theatres on Broadway, Off Broadway and throughout the United States, Ashley has done radio and acted in movies and television shows. She had a role in the 2005 version of The Producers and appeared in four episodes of the television series Law and Order.

Ashley has not only starred in numerous theatrical dramas but also in pretty much the whole gamut of musicals produced in the last few decades, including Hello Dolly, Gypsy, Sweeney Todd, Cabaret, The Music Man, Nonsense, Funny Girl, Fiddler on the Roof and the original Broadway production of Yentl with Tovah Feldshuh, before Barbra Streisand's movie version was made.

Mary Ellen Ashley

Before coming to Canada, Ashley appeared in the play Goodbye and Good Luck, based on a short story written by Grace Paley in 1959 for the book The Little Disturbances of Man.

"It starred Judy Kaye, Richard White and I," says Ashley. "It was at the Folksbiene Theater – the only remaining Yiddish-speaking theatre in New York."

"They are now trying to put on some English-speaking plays, although their mission was to do all plays in Yiddish. This was done in English. My character's name was Rosie. The music and lyrics were composed by Muriel Robinson and David Friedman. I hope to bring it up to Toronto.

"It is about a love affair at the turn of the 20th century in New York City between a young woman who is a factory worker and wants to get out of it and gets a job at the Second Avenue Jewish Theater – the quintessential Yiddish theatre in America. Great actors like Molly Picon came out of there," Ashley says.

When The Full Monty's run at Stage West ends, Ashley will be reprising the role of Marie in Easy Song Off Broadway.

Like The Full Monty's Jeanette, Ashley has tried to retire from showbiz without much success. "Every time I lose a job that I want, I say I'm not doing this again. Four months ago, I said I'm retiring and then the next week I got two offers," she says.

Ashley is also a theatrical producer and was involved with the play Angels in America. She has been married to Cyrus Rubin, a retired shoe manufacturer, for 40 years. The couple have two children – James, a journalist, and Diana, a former cable television news director – and four grandchildren.

For tickets to The Full Monty, call 905-238-0042 or visit Stage West's website at www.stagewest.com.

BREAKING BREAD WITH JOEL HECKER IS A MYSTICAL EXPERIENCE

Joel Hecker, formerly of Toronto, is the chair of the department of modern Jewish civilization and professor of Jewish mysticism at the Reconstructionist Rabbinical College in Wyncote, Penn.

A graduate of the University of Toronto, among other institutes of higher learning, Hecker is the author of Mystical Bodies, Mystical Meals: Eating and Embodiment in Medieval Kabbalah, a detailed study of eating practices and experiences in the Kabbalah, with a special focus on the Jewish mystical literature of late-13th-century Spain.

Torontonians have an opportunity to "break bread" with Hecker at a Kabbalah Shabbaton next week sponsored by the Lodzer Centre Congregation. He has been invited to speak as part of the Harry Kreitzman memorial series for Jewish enrichment.

Elaine Clarfield-Gitalis

The Shabbaton takes place June 22, beginning at 7 p.m., at 12 Heaton St. in the Sheppard-Bathurst area. Shabbat dinner is $30 for adults, $15 for children. Reservations are required (ideally by June 14). Call Sarah at 416-636-6665 or e-mail lodzerrabbi@rogers.com.

Mystical Bodies, Mystical Meals was published by the Wayne State University Press as part of its Raphael Patai series in Jewish folklore and anthropology.

Names in the News: Marla Rosen, a principal with Vancouver-based Big Dip Productions, launches Emotions, a new book and CD this month in conjunction with High Park Youth House, a Vancouver registered charity.

Emotions is a "fun and entertaining approach to behavioural education for children," says Rosen, a York University theatre graduate, performing arts educator and Montessori primary school teacher. The book's many colour illustrations focus on the human emotions and the CD's songs correspond to the content. A multi-sensory learning tool, the book and CD are meant to help children clarify how they feel. Order from White Knight Books, www.whiteknightbooks.ca.

To support and promote the development of emotional intelligence in children, Rosen has embarked on an Emotions interactive puppet show and concert tour across Canada this summer that includes various Toronto-area performances in mid-August. For details, visit www.emotionsbook.com/gigs.htm.

Iconic architect creates a ROM that's crystal clear

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

As you drive along Bloor Street, you'll see the finest gems in town at Cartier, Royal de Versailles and the Royal Ontario Museum.

Yes, the Royal Ontario Museum, where all the glitters is not gold.

You'll be dazzled by the brilliance and clarity of the Michael Lee-Chin Crystal, the ROM's new showpiece wing.

Everything takes on a new light at the Michael Lee-Chin Crystal, because, thanks to renowned architect Daniel Libeskind, Toronto has an incredible new ROM for everyone to discover – even the passersby.

Daniel Libeskind

How close are the fab five to his original drawings?

"Amazingly close, because you draw something out of your heart in a moment of inspiration." Libeskind replies on the phone from his New York office.

The crystal creations are made of 25 per cent glass and 75 per cent brushed aluminum cladding so that a warm silver tone catches the light.

Libeskind's work includes the redevelopment of the World Trade Center site at Ground Zero, the Jewish Museum of History in Berlin, the Danish Jewish Museum in Copenhagen, the Wohl Center in Ramat Gan, Israel, and the Jewish War Veterans' Memorial in Toronto's Earl Bales Park.

His goal is to transform the museum into a publicly accessible institution that's exciting, enlightening and engaging.

"Now when you go by, the ROM makes a gesture toward you – to beckon you… That's really the reason the crystals are shaped that way.

"I wanted to make sure that the building is visible, that it doesn't have one elevation but a myriad of elevations, including the roof, which can be seen from high-rise buildings around it. Like a crystal, it's highly visible and dynamic from every angle," Libeskind says.

Libeskind and his wife, Nina, were married in Toronto. The daughter of the late David Lewis, one of the founders of the NDP, and sister of diplomat Stephen Lewis, Nina is also his business partner.

Recognizing Bloor Street as "one of the great streets of North America," he reoriented the entrance to create a major plaza on Bloor in an area that was once a dark corner.

"The ROM isn't just a building. It's a public space for music, for performances, and it can reflect the life of the city. At night, the crystals will glow with the fantastic exhibits of dinosaurs and other collections."

Beyond the lobby is the outstanding Hyacinth Gloria Chen Crystal Court, a four-storey atrium where the heritage architecture meets the new design under magnificent crystalline skylights. There's also the Spirit House for contemplation, a vertical space that extends from the top to the bottom of the Lee-Chin Crystal. And don't miss the spectacular Stair of Wonders that will lead to many fascinating, unique collections.

Topping it all off is a crystal within a crystal. Libeskind designed a Swarovski chandelier that will radiate brilliantly over the grand staircase on the fourth floor and is breathtakingly beautiful!

Libeskind also restored the 10 heritage galleries to the beauty and elegance they had in 1914 when the building first opened, with plans to renovate existing galleries to their original splendour.

Contact the ROM for schedule of events and for details on gallery openings.

What message does Daniel Libeskind have for our readers?

"The ROM is going to be exciting. Buildings are not just abstract objects on the horizon, they communicate. This building will be a storyteller with tales about Toronto, about nature and culture, and about those who enter."

Milman's new CD evokes a smile

By JOSEPH SERGE
Arts Editor

sophie milman
make someone happy

When I first saw the song titles on Juno-nominated Sophie Milman's new CD Make Someone Happy, I cringed at the thought that she was singing the oft-recorded jazz cliche Fever.

But when I heard her soulful and refreshing take on this classic, my fears dissipated. Milman takes this song and adds confidence to her crisp, seductive voice to make it her own.

Milman's follow-up to her impressive self-titled debut, which sold 100,000 copies and hit the Top 5 in Canada, is full of such joyful surprises.

In addition to the Rogers/Hammerstein selections It Might As Well Be Spring and People Will Say We're In Love, the 24-year-old Russian-born Toronto singer shows her youthful versatility with such contemporary selections as Stevie Wonder's Rocket Love, the Guess Who's Undun (Randy Bachman plays guitar on his song) and Kermit the Frog's lament It's Not Easy Being Green – perhaps her own cheeky take on her career so far.

Other titles on this 13-song CD include Matchmaker, Matchmaker from Fiddler On The Roof, Chana Senesh's Eli Eli (A Walk to Caesarea) and the title track (made popular by Jimmy Durante).

On each song, Milman shows a delightful poise and maturity that belies her youth. Milman is going to be around for a long time.

Make Someone Happy (Linus Entertainment) is out June 19. She's playing across Canada over the next few weeks.

Check out her website www.sophiemilman.com.

Dancap's first season includes Jersey Boys, Avenue Q

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Businessman and philanthropist Aubrey Dan is bringing six award-winning musical productions to Toronto from Broadway and London in 2007-08.

"I want to make theatre something special to look forward to as one escapes everyday life," says Dan, who heads Dancap Productions.

Dan's love of theatre has led to his involvement with many successful theatrical productions in New York and Toronto.

He recently got permission to use the Toronto Centre for the Arts for a long run of the New York musical sensation Jersey Boys. Jersey Boys is the winner of the 2006 Tony Award for best musical and the 2006 Grammy Award for best musical show album.

Theatrical impresario Aubrey Dan at the recent celebration that launched Dancap Productions, with Academy Award-winning actor Cloris Leachman.

For months, it has been virtually impossible to get tickets to the New York production of Jersey Boys. Dan, who has been involved with the New York production, notes that the show recently opened in San Francisco and is scheduled to open in Chicago this fall.

The director of Jersey Boys, Des McAnuff, and the show's choreographer, Sergio Trugillo, are both originally from Toronto. The production team includes Paul Shaw, Peter Lamb and Jordan Fiksenbaum.

If the excitement at Dancap's recent gala launching at the Elgin and Winter Gardens theatres was any indication of the calibre of theatre Dancap will bring to Toronto, the city's languid theatre scene will soon be revitalized.

Academy Award-winning actor Cloris Leachman hosted the celebration. Many celebrities were on hand, and they were treated to a sampling of some spectacular performances from the upcoming Dancap season.

Since the collapse of Garth Drabinsky's theatre production company "Livent," the Live Entertainment Corporation of Canada, in 1998, Mirvish Productions has been the only big-name company involved in commercial theatre in Toronto.

Dan says he has the greatest respect for Mirvish Productions; however, he believes the city "can sustain more than one theatrical company."

He hopes that Jersey Boys and his other world-class productions will revitalize the surrounding business community and draw people to the city, he says.

Along with Jersey Boys, the productions for the 2007-08 season include The Drowsy Chaperone, The 25th Annual Putnam County Spelling Bee, 3 Mo' Divas, My Fair Lady and Avenue Q.

Dan says that Dancap plans to produce its own productions in the future and use Canadian personnel whenever it can.

Dancap offers subscribers a unique reward program through which they can accumulate points.

"I want people to go back to the theatre on an ongoing basis," Dan says. "We have used the airlines as a model for rewards, and we believe that Dancap is the only theatrical company in North America to initiate these rewards."

Along with a six-series package, Dancap has created a three-program subscription package for those who travel south for the winter.

Dan's father, philanthropist Leslie Dan, came to Canada from Hungary in 1948 with only five dollars in his pocket. The elder Dan couldn't speak a word of English, but entered Harbord Collegiate, which he breezed through. He graduated from the University of Toronto's School of Pharmacy and went on to found the generic pharmaceutical company Novopharm.

Aubrey Dan, now 43, the middle of three children, was raised in Don Mills. After graduating from the University of Western Ontario, he joined the family business. He later became the president of the pharmaceutical company Wampole Canada Inc. and went on to found Dancap Global Asset Management and Dancap Private Equity Inc.

His interest in the performing arts began when he first met his wife, Marla, in 1988. "On our first date, we went to see a play at CanStage. I wound up falling in love with Marla and with the theatre at the same time," Dan recalls.

"There will be clear conditions [to ensure only faith-based schools can qualify for public funding]," Tory said.

Tory also announced that if elected, his party would spend $800 million to strengthen public education.

Jewish groups that have long been involved in advocating for funding faith-based schools, and who attended the conference, reacted with tempered excitement.

In a joint press release, Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto applauded the Tory position, which mirrors the one the two groups have been recommending.

"This approach to public education is a welcome step that will serve Ontario students well," said Joel Richler, chair of CJC, Ontario region. "This should not be a partisan issue. It's simply the right thing to do."

UJA Federation chair David Engel echoed Richler's sentiments, saying the announcement reflects that "inclusive public education should be a reality for all of Ontario's children."

> 'A welcome step that will serve Ontario students well'

Similarly, the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS), which held a Shabbat dinner at the PC conference, referenced some of the major criteria outlined in the PC agenda on faith-based education, which included: incorporating the requirements of Ontario's common curriculum as part of faith-based curricula; participating in Ontario's standardized testing program and appropriately addressing "teacher credentialing."

In a statement, Stuart Lewis, executive director of the OAJDS, said he plans to call on all day school presidents to "include some key statements and updates about this vital community matter" in their respective graduation addresses this year.

But, Lewis cautioned, "it is important that we only endorse policy and not any political party or make partisan statements."

B'nai Brith also praised the Conservatives.

"We welcome John Tory's pledge for equal funding of Ontario's faith-based schools," said Frank Dimant, the organization's executive vice-president. "For too long, the government's discriminatory policy of funding only Roman Catholic schools… has persisted without reform."

Jewish schools and schools of other faiths currently receive no public funding, forcing parents to pay high tuition fees in order to educate their children, while the government continues to fund Roman Catholic schools.

The Liberal government has maintained that it's constitutionally obligated to fund Roman Catholic schools.

It argues that the 1867 Constitution, which sought to protect existing rights for denominational schools of the time, requires Ontario to maintain a publicly funded Roman Catholic system.

In 1999, the United Nations Human Rights Committee (UNHRC) ruled that this funding is discriminatory, violating Canada's obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, saying the need to protect Roman Catholic funding is now out of step with modern times.

The UNHRC censured the province again on the issue in a 2005 report.

Jews in the ring: brawn over brain

By ELISA BIRNBAUM
Special to The CJN

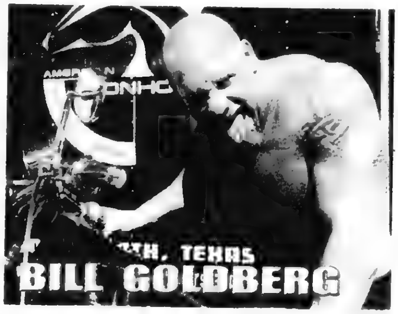
I have vivid memories of Sunday afternoons at my grandparents' duplex in Montreal. While my grandmother busied herself with the sounds and smells of baked goods and the occasional plea for me to eat more, my grandfather would bask in the glare of the TV, captivated by the sounds and smells of a different nature: wrestling.

Armed with an overflowing plate of hot, freshly made oatmeal cookies, I would sit myself down on the couch, as close to my zaide as possible. Close enough to take it all in – from the primal sounds of mean-looking men in strange outfits to my grandfather's animated facial expressions and the occasional colourful and unrepeatable Yiddishisms he'd shout at the screen.

Yet, the spectacle on TV was always less fascinating to me than the spell wrestling had cast on my zaide and others like him. In a religion dominated by scholars, scientists and other heady sorts, I wondered how this purely corporeal event entered the Jewish home. While few wrestlers at that time were Jewish, I was enchanted with stories my grandfather recounted about similarly angry men who, once upon a time, earned the naches of their Jewish mothers. In fact, according to Eddy Portnoy, a noted scholar of Jewish popular culture in pre-World War II eastern Europe and North America, wrestling has played a significant role in Jewish social history.

Speaking recently at an event sponsored by the Polish-Jewish Heritage Foundation of Canada, Portnoy said the 1920s saw a number of prominent Jewish wrestlers put that stereotype of the bookish Jew to the test. In Poland, for example, grapplers with names like Max Krauser and Zelig Pashov, or the Jewish Hercules, were as common as their Polish-sounding counterparts. Since wrestlers at that time relied on their ethnic affiliations to establish a fan base, Jews found themselves figuring prominently not only as sportsmen but also as enthusiastic audience members.

But, stated Portnoy, a professor of history at the Jewish Theological Seminary, the national element of Jewish fandom befuddled Jewish intelligentsia, who found themselves asking, "shouldn't scholars and scientists be the ones who inspire the masses?" Nevertheless, while intellectuals deemed wrestling the antithesis of "Jewishness," fans couldn't get enough, often becoming frenzied in support of their Jewish heroes. Portnoy explained this phenomenon by saying that wrestling gave Jews a unique opportunity to engage in short-lived and relatively safe public displays of pride in the face of a majority culture. Moreover, he added, "wrestling proved to be more gratifying and immediate than any of the abstract national, political and religious movements that offered to provide Jews with a way of dealing with their role as second-class citizens."



With ethnic identity playing such an integral role in cultivating a fan base, claiming one's "Jewishness" certainly had its benefits. Some non-Jewish wrestlers placed Stars of David on their trunks – a common practice for Jewish wrestlers – and used Jewish names, hoping to ride the coattail of Jewish adulation. Others, such as Pashov, found himself having to prove his "Jewishness" in the wake of contradictory evidence. The situation became so dire that Pashov's own mother was ushered into Warsaw carrying with her documentation to substantiate the wrestler's true ethnicity, much to the delight of the crowds.

Jews also sought out the "Jewishness" of wrestlers even when it wasn't there. In 1925, fans contested the ethnicity of one Leon Pinyetski – a Pole known for his expert use of the full nelson – saying he had a Jewish nose and ate kugel on Saturday.

The Jewish invasion of wrestling went beyond athletes and fans. When the sport's popularity in Europe was eclipsed by boxing in the 1930s, some wrestlers were shipped to North America by Warsaw-born promoter Jacob Pfefer. Known as the "Plotter from Pinsk" and the "Smirker from Smolensk," for nearly 50 years Pfefer played a major role in the world of wrestling. Recognized as having introduced the grotesque to the wrestling arena, Pfefer boasted a roster of grapplers with handlebar mustaches, shaved heads and tattoos. Thanks to this Plotter from Pinsk, the world was introduced to "Blimp" Levy, a former fat man at a sideshow in Coney Island. Weighing 625 pounds – yet known to be extremely nimble – Levy said wrestling kept him slim, a comment considered less ironic when, years after retiring, he was found dead in an Alabama trailer park weighing more than 900 pounds.

Blimp Levy aside, most Jewish wrestlers were known less for their physical grandeur and more for their speed and agility. Take Abe (Hebrew Hercules) Coleman, the "Jewish Tarzan." After emigrating from Poland to Winnipeg in 1923, he soon moved to New York where, all of five foot three inches tall, but weighing 200 pounds, he established a reputation as a major wrestling contender. Coleman, who recently died at the age of 101, was allegedly responsible for inventing the "drop kick," after observing kangaroos in Australia engaging in a similar move.

One of the last of the "old time" wrestlers still alive today is Rafael (Rasslin' Rabbi) Halperin. After immigrating to Palestine from Vienna, he studied in yeshiva with the Chazon Ish but was later brought to the United States. It was there where he enjoyed immense popularity as a wrestler, all the while refusing to fight on the Sabbath. In the 1960s, he returned to Israel and become a rabbi and a successful businessman.

With Halperin out of the ring, the glory days of Jewish wrestling seem to have waned, though Barry Horowitz and Ric Drasin gained respectable acclaim in the 1970s and '80s, while "Macho Man" Randy Savage has a Jewish mother.

Portnoy attributes this reality to the emergence of a stronger Jewish middle class. "Middle class interests are perceived as leaning more toward 'refined sports,'" he offered. Nevertheless, few can forget the hubbub over William Scott (Bill) Goldberg who graced the wrestling stages from 1997 to 2004. Known especially for his unique entrance, the wrestler from Texas was ushered to his matches by police escort, while adoring fans chanted, "Goldberg, Goldberg."

Though Goldberg's Jewishness didn't hold the same resonance that a grappler's ethnicity held in the past, I can't help but wonder if today's Jewish wrestlers were somehow influenced by the stream of Jews who entered the ring before them. Jews who – in the vein of Samson and David – chose brawn over brain to elicit victory. Jewish social history would not be complete without a mention of these athletes who broke down barriers and stereotypes and of the Jewish fans who cheered them on. Fans like my zaide whose afternoon choice of escapism remains a cherished memory today.

Lucky bystanders – for now

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

Last August, as Israel was ending its campaign in Lebanon, I argued in this space that it would be a mistake to mark the battle against Hezbollah as a defeat.

"Israel did just about all it realistically could in its attempt to defeat Hezbollah," I wrote, but "in an age where nations at war need as many lawyers and PR agents as foot soldiers, the aftershocks of a large-scale invasion of Lebanon were potentially more damaging than helpful." I still feel the same way, despite the Winograd commission report that essentially accused Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert and his cabinet of incompetence (a charge I don't necessarily disagree with). Israel didn't lose last summer's war, it simply didn't win.

Ten months later, not much has changed on the Israeli side. The country is still run by Olmert and, minus a handful of resignations, his wartime cabinet. Don't expect that to change any time soon, either: even with Olmert's approval ratings hovering around the laughable figure of five per cent, there is little chance of a summertime vote, because unlike in previous election cycles, the Labor and Likud parties – and their respective recycled leaders – are neither ready nor willing to hit the campaign trail.

And yet, this sluggishness might have improved, albeit indirectly, Israel's situation vis-a-vis its Arab neighbours. You see, inertia has long been the dominant theme of the Muslim world. It's a case of same old, same old in most Arab countries – same laws, same intolerances, same complaints. Just about the only thing that seems to wake them up is Israel – or more accurately, an opportunity to accuse Israel of crimes against Muslims.

But in the last 10 months, while waiting for the Winograd axe to fall, the Olmert government has been unable to lift a finger, and the Arabs have been left with little – or at least nothing new – to complain about.

So, even though common sense suggests that Israel's enemies would have come to a shared conclusion – that the political gridlock and low public morale in Israel presented a prime window to consolidate attacks against Israel – the exact opposite happened.

The Arabs decided to fight each other instead: the Lebanese government, finally waking up to the fact that terrorists in its domain are as much a threat to the Lebanese people as Israelis, have fought back against terror groups festering in Palestinian refugee camps (it turns out they have those in Lebanon, too).

And in the West Bank, Fatah and Hamas continue to kill each other in an effort to gain control of the economically stagnant Palestinian territories. At least in Arab terms, the Palestinian civil war offers a coveted prize – the distinction of being the leader in the war to destroy Israel – for the last terror group standing.

There is a line somewhere about Arabs and missed opportunities…

You can count on Islamic terrorists and Arab political and religious leaders who harbour terrorists to lay down (or simply forget to play) some of their best hands. But every once in a while, they do recognize an opportunity – and the results, as we witnessed last August, can be damaging, if not devastating.

In the short term, battling to a draw is acceptable only if it helps you learn how to defeat your enemy at some later point. But in the 10 months since the war, Israel's political leadership hasn't shown any sign that it has drawn lessons from the Lebanon campaign.

Israel has been a lucky bystander so far, but inaction can only lead to trouble down the road.

YAKATORI

1/2 cup soy sauce
2 tblsps. vegetable oil
2 tblsps. lemon juice
1 tblsp. sesame seeds
2 tblsps. white sugar
2 green onions, thinly sliced
1 clove garlic, minced
1/2 tsp. ground ginger
1 lb. steak, cubed

In a glass or plastic bowl, whisk together soy sauce, oil, lemon juice, sesame seeds, sugar, green onions, garlic, ginger. Thread meat cubes onto skewers. (If you are using wooden skewers, soak them 30 min. first.) Place skewers in plastic or glass container; pour marinade over meat, turning to coat well. Cover, chill minimum 4 hrs. Brush grate with oil or cooking spray, then preheat grill on high. Place skewers on grill 10-15 min. occasionally turning to ensure even cooking.

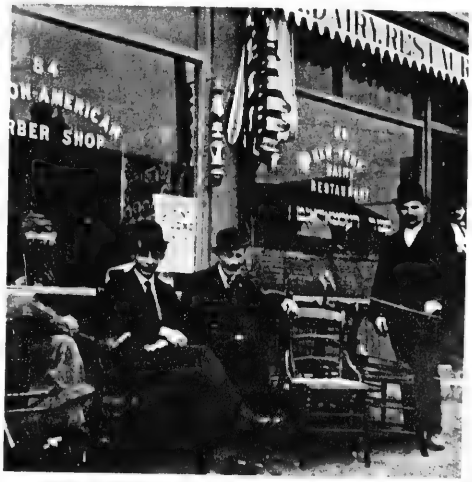
Remembering Our Yesterdays

By BILL GLADSTONE

New York Dairy Restaurant, 1912



The New York Dairy Restaurant, on the northwest corner of Elizabeth and Albert streets, was one of many kosher eateries in the old downtown "Ward" neighbourhood. Perhaps these gentlemen were recent immigrants who were still waiting for their families to join them from Europe and needed a place to take their meals. Numerous local Jewish-run boarding houses also served "heimishe" kosher fare. The buildings on this and neighbouring blocks were torn down in 1912 to make way for the municipal registry office, which in turn was razed to make way for the new Toronto City Hall. On being on the same page

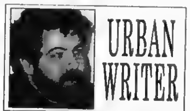
By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG



When two people share the same bus every day, they begin to know each other in some way, even if words are never exchanged.

I have been writing for the Canadian Jewish News for six years, four years on a weekly basis, and various people have shared this page with me during this time. We have ridden a ride of words and thoughts together.

Sandie Benitah, who writes a monthly column called 20Something, is one of my fellow passengers. In her last column, titled "Adulthood arrives in a moment," Sandy wrote about her boyfriend, John Hanan, who passed away on April 19.

Sandie and I have spoken a few times over the last couple of years, but not in ways that could be construed as a real conversation. Regardless, we share something special that you can only find on the second-last page of The CJN.

I, therefore, feel a certain affinity for her. We are both writers who are passionate about the Jewish community, and we both enjoy commenting on the nuances of what occurs in our day-to-day lives.

It's for this reason that I dedicate my column to the memory of John Hanan, a person I never met. It is also for this reason that I send public condolences to Sandie for the man she hoped to introduce to us as her fiancé, but instead communicated to us that now "my heart is broken."

Sandie, my dear friend Eli Rubenstein has created a booklet, Readings for a House of Mourning, that contains poems, short stories and articles about losing a loved one. It is well-researched and unique among literature that deals with the ache of loss.

I tell you this so that you will not be as alone in your suffering as you might otherwise be. I tell you this so that you might find comfort in the words of others during those stingingly hushed moments that reflect the quote from Psalms that you will find on the opening pages of this booklet: "I lift my eyes to the mountains. From where will my help come?"

I will forward the booklet to you, so that you have at your bedside the words of Sigmund Freud, who wrote to his friend after the death of his daughter, Sophie: "Although we know that after such a loss the acute state of mourning will subside, we also know we shall remain inconsolable and will never find a substitute. No matter what may fill the gap – even if it be filled completely, it nevertheless remains something else. And actually this is how it should be… it is the lonely way of perpetuating that love which we do not want to relinquish."

Sandie, people's written words of support are often more sensible than their spoken words during a time of mourning. Therefore, use this book well. Read it when you please and uncover the distinctive truth that's found only in hardship through such vignettes as Four Things (author unknown), which reads: "These things are beautiful beyond belief:
The pleasant weakness that comes after pain,
The radiant greenness that comes after rain,
The deepened faith that follows after grief,
And the awakening to love again."

We, the writers and readers of the Canadian Jewish News community, bless you with strength and extend our appreciation for having the courage to share your thoughts, more intimate than any, about a man "whose brilliance continues to light the world though… no longer among the living. These lights are particularly bright when the night is dark. They light the way for humanity." (Chana Senesh)

John Hanan, rest in peace. You had a great love in Sandie Benitah, your Number 1 admirer.

There was a man and he exists no more. His life song was broken off halfway. He had one more poem. And that poem is lost, forever.
– Chayim Nachman Bialik

Bulka and Abitbol acclaimed as co-presidents of CJC

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — For the first time, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) will be led by co-presidents, following the acclamation of Sylvain Abitbol and Rabbi Reuven Bulka at its 28th Plenary Assembly last weekend.

Abitbol and Rabbi Bulka enthusiastically praised each other's strengths, with both saying they will complement each other.

"We will work hard to build bridges with the left. We can't ignore the interaction with other communities, to build more bridges," Abitbol said in his acceptance remarks at Agudath Israel Congregation.

"And one goal that I added myself today: I want to prove wrong everyone who today did not agree with what we are doing [passing new CJC governance structures]. We are going to be successful because we cannot afford not to be successful. We live in a very dangerous world."

Rabbi Bulka pledged to visit Canada's small and "forgotten" Jewish communities, to ensure they also have a voice in the CJC.

"We have an abiding commitment, Sylvain and I, and a great team… One thing is indisputable: Congress will continue to be the voice of the Jewish people in Canada, not only to the Jewish community, but also to the non-Jewish community."

In a sometimes heated debate that brought more than a dozen speakers to the microphones, the CJC governance rules were amended under omnibus Bylaw 67, which does away with elections for the position of president of Congress. The bylaw is intended to streamline the governance structure of the organization.

Israel welcomes new Abbas government

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — Israel is welcoming the appointment of a new Palestinian government, but it remains wary about what lies ahead.

Mahmoud Abbas lost no time responding to Hamas' coup in Gaza last week, which took the world by surprise. Having fired his Islamist rivals from the government, the Palestinian Authority president on Sunday swore in a moderate new cabinet aimed at ushering in renewed aid from Western donors.

"Today is a new era, a turning point for ending the siege and rebuilding the Palestinian Authority," Abbas spokesperson Nabil Abu Rdainah said.

He is joined by 12 other ministers, including two women, who were hand-picked by Abbas, though they are not all nominally from his Fatah faction.

Hamas, which purged Fatah from Gaza in a six-day civil war last week, rejected the "emergency" government as a coup attempt and said the previous cabinet under Ismail Haniyeh was still in force.

"This appointment is illegitimate and a violation of all national agreements," Hamas official Sami Abu Zuhri said.

But Abbas – who invoked presidential privilege to extend his new cabinet's term beyond the 30 days allowed under Palestinian Authority law – was hailed in Israel and beyond.

Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, who travelled to the United States for consultations with President George W. Bush and UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, spoke of a potential breakthrough in peace efforts with Abbas.

But major hurdles still lie ahead.

Even if Israel, the Palestinians and the West reconcile themselves to dealing with the West Bank and Gaza as separate de facto entities, there is no guarantee of Abbas' continued rule in the former.

A restoration of donor aid would do much to shore him up in the eyes of his people. Most of that donor aid was cut off when Hamas was elected to power in January 2006.

Calgarians Walk

CALGARY — Some 500 Calgarians took part June 10 in the Calgary Jewish Community Council's second annual Walk with Israel. The five-kilometre walk started at the Calgary Jewish Community Centre and ended with a free Israeli festival and market.

Hate Material Seized

REGINA — Regina police seized a computer hard drive, DVDs, CDs and other material during a June 8 search at the home of Terry Tremaine, self-styled leader of the National Socialist Party of Canada (NSPC). Tremaine, 58, a former mathematics lecturer at the University of Saskatchewan, is being investigated for willfully promoting hatred. The raid came after criminal complaints last fall by Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman and Canadian Jewish Congress about hate postings targeting Jewish, black and First Nations communities on a U.S. neo-Nazi website and a now defunct NSPC site.

WORLD

Waldheim Headed UN

VIENNA — Kurt Waldheim, the former UN chief with a Nazi past, died in Vienna June 14 of heart failure at 88. He was hospitalized last month with an infection. Waldheim served as UN secretary general for from 1972 to 1982, and was elected Austrian president in 1986. His career was overshadowed by revelations he served in a unit of the Nazi armed forces that committed war crimes in the Balkans in 1942. He maintained that he did not commit war crimes.

School Trial Begins

VIENNA — A trial began here last week into whether an Orthodox school can expel the children of an anti-Zionist haredi man. Moishe Arye Friedman, 35, gained notoriety for attending a Holocaust revisionist conference last year in Tehran, where he shook hands with Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad. His children were barred at the end of January from the school, Machzikei Hadas. Friedman sued to gain their re-entry, but a Vienna court upheld the expulsions. In March, however, a federal court ruled that until the case ends, Friedman's four older children – girls aged 8 to 13 – must be allowed back in. The court agreed they were being unfairly punished for Friedman's activities. The Austrian Supreme Court upheld that ruling June 1. But despite heavy fines and threatened closure, the school is holding its ground, a position that's supported by its parents, the umbrella group of Vienna Jewry and a number of Orthodox rabbis who serve the parents.

Rothschild Dies

VIENNA — Baron Guy de Rothschild, patriarch of the storied French Jewish banking family, died June 12 in Paris at 98. He saw his family bank taken over during the Nazi occupation in 1940 because it was owned by Jews. In 1981, the bank was again taken over, this time by the Socialists under then-president Francois Mitterrand. In an editorial in Le Monde, Rothschild accused the Socialists of anti-Semitism. His son David rebuilt the family banking network. Rothschild also founded and headed the United Jewish Welfare Fund, France's main Jewish philanthropic agency, from 1950 to 1982.

Controversial Prof Denied Tenure at DePaul

CHICAGO — DePaul University denied tenure to Norman Finkelstein, a political science professor who raised hackles for saying that Jewish groups have exploited the Holocaust.

Norman Finkelstein "plays fast and loose" with the facts he cited in his scholarly work, said Michael Kotzin, executive vice-president of the Chicago's Jewish federation.

Norman Finkelstein

He added that the federation was careful not to impinge on the Chicago school's right to make its choice, stressing that DePaul had an "absolutely internal basis for the decision based on their standards and principals."

In a letter to Finkelstein, DePaul's president, Rev. Dennis Holtschneider, cited a statement by the university's board that "expressed several concerns touching on his scholarship, specifically what they consider the intellectual character of his work and his persona as a public intellectual."

The pro-Israel student group StandWithUs and Harvard University law professor Alan Dershowitz were among those urging DePaul not to grant tenure to Finkelstein.

Finkelstein, a child of Holocaust survivors, has argued that Jewish groups "have exploited the Holocaust to enrich themselves or to justify Israeli politics."

He told the Chicago Sun-Times after the decision, "They can deny me tenure, deny me the right to teach. But they will never stop me from saying what I believe."

Education funding set to become Ont. election issue

Community to launch advocacy blitz

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Ontario Jewish community is preparing to make education funding a priority in the run-up to the Oct. 10 provincial election.

On the heels of this month's promise by the opposition Conservatives to bring faith-based schools into the public system, and to inject $800 million into public education if elected, Jewish leaders are grappling with how to maintain momentum on what they see as the race's key issue.

Ira Walfish, chair of the Multi-Faith Coalition (MFC), a funding lobby group, said he was "thrilled" with the Tory announcement and that his group will work with other Jewish community organizations, such as the Canadian Jewish Congress, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools to educate the province's faith communities on the importance of the issue.

In the past, the coalition had been critical of the federation for not doing enough public advocacy on the education file.

"[Congress and federation] always wanted this type of [policy], and we were always a little more tolerant of a tax credit. But that's irrelevant now… we're now all on the same page," Walfish said, referring to the tax credit for private school tuition that was introduced by the former Tory government and repealed by the Liberals.

Walfish added that the MFC has already held talks with Congress and federation to strategize collaboratively on a joint communications plan.

"We believe one of the weaknesses of the struggle we've been waging over 30 years [for education funding] is the mobilization of our own community," he said. "And we don't want that weakness to exist again. We're going to be sparing no effort to educate our community and mobilize them on this issue."

English said federation and CJC will soon launch a "massive" ad campaign and speaking engagement blitz to educate the public about what faith-based funding will mean.

"We're talking about the use of as many marketing vehicles as we can afford to get the message out," he said.

Enrolment surge predicted

If public funding for faith-based schools becomes a reality after the Oct. 10 provincial election, some Jewish educators are predicting a happy outcome: a surge in enrolment.

Seymour Epstein, executive director of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, was energized about the recent Conservative promise to fund faith-based schools by bringing them into the public system.

"This is a major moment of promise," Epstein told The CJN last week. "Funding for the Jewish day schools and all faith-based day schools is what we've been praying for for decades."

Epstein said the primary obstacle for parents looking to send their children to Jewish day schools would, in essence, be eliminated if the Progressive Conservative party pledge becomes a reality.

"There could be scenarios in which we see a dramatic increase in enrolment and we have to deal with that issue," he said. "The thousands of parents out there who had dismissed the idea of [Jewish] day school education because they couldn't see themselves affording it… may register their children in the day schools of their choice."

Paul Shaviv, education director for the Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT), also pondered the enrolment question while praising the Tory plan.

"We would be delighted to have the problem of massive over-subscription," Shaviv said.

CJC plenary: a reporter's notebook

From the editor's desk

The number 28 in Hebrew carries a special gematriah – a numerical equivalent for the letters that spell a certain word. It equates to the word for "strength."

This past weekend, that number and its gematriahtic equivalent were also a harbinger.

For fittingly, strength of human character, strongly worded opinions and strong-willed individuals were very much on display Sunday at the 28th Canadian Jewish Congress Plenary Assembly that was held at the Agudath Israel Congregation in Ottawa.

It was expected.

* * *

The delegates at the assembly voted upon history-making changes in the governance of the venerable and venerated organization.

They were asked to approve Bylaw 67. Among many other important administrative changes aimed at modernizing the organization, enabling it to respond more effectively to the inevitable crises and challenges of our constantly set-upon Jewish world and troubled world-at-large, the bylaw essentially eliminated elections for the position of president. It also paved the way, at this plenary, for the first-ever co-presidency of the Congress.

High drama enveloped the proceedings. A motion to table the vote on the bill was defeated. A motion for a secret ballot – as opposed to the traditional show of hands – on the motion to table was also defeated.

The bylaw needed two-thirds of the votes from the 175 delegates in the room to pass. Because of the crowded seating arrangements in the sanctuary, counting the vote was somewhat problematic. Ultimately, the bylaw passed with more than the required vote. The resolutions chair, Adam Atlas, announced 120 votes in favour. The margin may have actually been even higher.

After the vote and the fiery debate that accompanied it, even as people were rushing out of the room to find a place in the social hall for lunch, there was a palpable sense among the delegates that something big had just happened. But they could not dwell on it. The program was too crowded with presentations and presenters, and it was already running an hour late.

Later in the day's proceedings, before he launched into his remarks thanking federal Environment Minister John Baird for addressing the plenary, Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA) co-chair, Steven Cummings of Montreal, responded to the lingering sense among some delegates that a Congress light had been diminished.

"With elation that accompanies change, there is always some disappointment, too," he said. "But it is important that we stay together, that we stay within the broad tend of our wonderful community."

Outgoing CJC president Ed Morgan echoed the same theme in his farewell address. Using a story by S.Y. Agnon called The Mitpachat (The Kerchief), as a parable, he urged delegates "not to keep fretting about the bylaws and the internal structure. We must, rather, look beyond that. We must develop the ability to look truth in the eyes and do something good for the world.

"We must now look to trying to bind the wounds of the world. We are an advocacy organization and we must get on with it."

* * *

Israel's ambassador to Canada, Alan Baker, shared some of the professional frustrations he experiences in trying to discharge his duties on behalf of the Jewish state.

For example, he told the delegates that Israel is the only country in Ottawa that is not represented in a regional grouping in the diplomatic corps. The grouping of which Israel is part has had its name changed from the Middle Eastern group of countries to the Arab group of countries. As a result, once again, Israel finds itself isolated, outside the geographic grouping to which it naturally belongs.

* * *

Maj.-Gen. Abdeljebbar Azzaoui, director of intelligence and counter-terrorism in the kingdom of Morocco delivered the keynote address. His topic was how to counter global terrorism.

He identified the various steps that his country has taken in the fight against terrorism, and especially after the Al Qaeda strike in Casablanca in May 2003.

The real significance of his remarks was that he made them at all. He began his presentation by saying, "It's always a pleasure to be with friends."

Azzaoui did not shrink from challenging his fellow Muslims. He made the following three points:

- "Counter-terror measures should be multi-pronged within the Muslim world.
- "We must try to isolate the radicals within Muslim communities, and
- "It is the Islamic communities themselves that must be the backbone in the fight against terrorism so that there is no impression of a clash of civilizations."

* * *

Flashing his sense of humour, and in a reference to his newly minted co-president Rabbi Reuven Bulka, Sylvain Abitbol told the delegates that "everything we do now will be under rabbinic supervision."

Then he set out three specific goals for the upcoming two-year term: confront the new anti-Semitism growing in Quebec; build bridges with the left; and seek rapprochement with other minority communities.

* * *

A great deal of individual and collective strength was on display at the 28th CJC plenary. A great deal more will be needed to fight the battles that lie ahead.

Police cite teacher's bravery in shooting incident

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

A lockdown at Leo Baeck Day School in Thornhill following gunfire between police and a robbery suspect on school grounds has "really unified" the school community, says school director David Prashker.

"We got through, and we got through safely," he said. "There could easily have been death and injury."

The incident began at about 1 p.m. on June 11, when York Regional Police responded to calls about a gunman in the Promenade Mall.

According to police, one call was from the Jewellery Company, located on the second floor of the mall. The caller indicated a man was in the store waving a gun and yelling at employees. He demanded they fill up a bag with jewelry.

The man fled with almost $300,000 worth of merchandise, police said. He was pursued on foot by mall security, with police joining in on the ground and by helicopter.

The gunman showed up on school grounds at Leo Baeck and then at Netivot HaTorah Day School, Leo Baeck's next-door neighbour to the south. Both schools implemented emergency lockdown procedures.

Zlatko Sarcevic, a Grade 4 gym teacher at Leo Baeck, rushed a class of 18 students into the building after noticing a police helicopter overhead. Sarcevic was to receive a citation Friday afternoon at the school from York Regional Police Chief Armand La Barge, Prashker said.

He said he instituted a lockdown because of the gunfire and "extensive police activity" just outside the school.

The lockdown lasted from shortly after 1 p.m. until about 6:20 p.m., but Leo Baeck's 534 students were allowed to leave at the usual 3:30 dismissal time. Parents picked them up under police supervision so as not to disturb evidence, Prashker said.

During the crisis, the school implemented safety procedures put into place just over a year ago, Prashker added. He credited Sarcevic, who "reacted outstandingly," and all of his staff for knowing "exactly what to do," moving children away from windows, closing the blinds and locking the doors, and above all, keeping students calm.

York Regional Police Chief Armand La Barge, left, and Inspector Les Young presented gym teacher Zlatko Sarcevic with a police citation and plaque on June 15 at Leo Baeck Day School in Thornhill.

"Some got on with teaching, and some kept the kids quietly amused," Prashker said. A junior kindergarten teacher created a fort out of tables, and the children played there.

Prashker also praised Leo Baeck students. "They dealt with the situation in a truly admirable manner."

However, he noted, a lockdown is "a traumatic thing." Although plans for senior students to run a charity car wash the following day proceeded as planned, the school brought in a senior team from JVS the same day for children and teachers who wanted to talk.

In addition, Prashker, branch principal Jan Lapedus, and student services supervisor Yvette Burke visited every classroom as part of a follow-up.

"One of the keys was validating [students'] responses," Prashker said. "Some kids were scared and some weren't… It's OK to have been scared, and if you weren't scared, that's OK too. That's one of the knowns of psychology. Different people react differently."

At Netivot, just south of Leo Baeck, security guard Kayran Crosbie, who has been working at the school for only a couple of months, saw the suspect hiding near a wooden garbage housing.

Thinking the man was a trespasser, Crosbie started to approach him to ask what his business was at the school, he told The CJN. But before he could make his presence known, he saw the man pull out a gun, take aim and fire at a police officer.

Officers returned fire, but did not strike the suspect, police said. At that point, police alerted schools in the area to go into lockdown mode.

At the same time, Crosbie, who had ducked behind a blue Dodge Caravan, called the Netivot office to advise the school to implement lockdown procedures. He saw the man run and drop a bag. Crosbie notified the school, then retrieved the bag so the school could notify police about it.

After leaving the school area, the gunman made his way to a home on Rodeo Drive and forced two women into a van in the garage. As he fled in the van with the two hostages, he was pursued by police. One officer fired a gun in an unsuccessful attempt to stop them from leaving. The suspect was arrested at Keele Street and Highway 7 after losing control of the van. The women were not injured, and a black and silver CO2-powered pellet gun was seized from the vehicle.

Quincy Cave, 30, of Toronto, who was on probation at the time of his arrest, is in custody facing 30 charges. He will appear in court in Newmarket June 26.

Israel has come a long way since '67: Meridor

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The Jewish community in Toronto continued to celebrate the 40th anniversary of the reunification of Jerusalem and Israel's victory during the Six Day War at Beth Tzedec Congregation last week.

Dan Meridor, the international chair of the Jerusalem Foundation and former Israeli finance minister, was the keynote speaker at an event titled Jerusalem: Ours to Celebrate, Ours to Share, which included live music by Daphna Tzur and Orly Cohen, as well as testimony from those who lived through one of the greatest moments in Israeli history.

Dan Meridor

Beth Tzedec Rabbi Baruch Frydman-Kohl, who is known throughout the community for being a proud supporter of Israel, talked about the importance of Israel's victory 40 years ago.

"The media tells us that the war has lead to years of pain, struggle and loss for the Palestinians. The negative attention is deeply disturbing… But our history teaches us that every achievement exacts a cost. Had the allies not fought the Nazis, the world would be immeasurably worse. Yet many innocents were injured and killed by the forces in Britain, Canada and the United States. Had Israel not fought and prevailed in 1967, it would not exist today, and I doubt that the Middle East would be in better shape," Rabbi Frydman-Kohl said.

When Meridor took to the podium to address roughly 400 people, he shared his bittersweet memories of being a soldier in the Israel Defence Forces, sitting on his tank near the Suez Canal 40 years ago to the day, when he heard the news that Jerusalem had just been liberated.

He said that although he was elated that Jerusalem had been unified, he was disappointed that he was not there to be a part of the celebration.

"It was tough to someone like me, who had been born in Jerusalem," Meridor said.

Not only did the reunification of Jerusalem give Jews full access to the Israeli capital, Meridor said the war helped start the peace process with the Arabs.

"Until 1967, we had no territories, nothing was occupied, so to speak… and not one Arab ruler was willing to talk with us, let alone make peace with us," he said.

He said that the rulers of the surrounding Arab countries felt that it would just be a matter of time before they'd be able to rid the world of the State of Israel.

"[The Six Day War] changed this dramatically. Israel stopped looking like and being this fragile state, and it became and was seen as a strong neighbour. It took some time, and it crept into the understanding of our neighbours. The first to understand this, three years later was King Hussein of Jordan."

He said that after Black September in 1970, when Palestinian guerrillas used Jordan as its base for the war against Israel and attempted to overthrow his monarchy, King Hussein became Israel's best ally.

"It wasn't because he saw the justice in the Zionist cause, unfortunately, but because we were strong. We built strength, and he understood that we were not going to be wiped off the map, that we were here to stay."

Meridor said given the situation in Israel, it is easy to be pessimistic about Israel's future. But it is important to remember how far the Jewish state has come over the past 40 years.

"Usually we tend to be depressed because of television, and because some stupid guys in Britain [the University and College Union, UNISON and the National Union of Journalists] want to boycott us. When everything seems bad, look at the long range and see what a wonderful leap we have had since the Six Day War. Not that we don't have problems… but look at the long range of where we were then and where we are now."

Meridor spoke about the need to embrace people of all religions, especially Jews, Christians and Muslims who view Jerusalem as the Holy Land.

"It is a city of conflict and it is a test of co-existence. It is a great challenge, but we must see to it that everyone gets a share in it," he said.

"The battle is still ahead of us and we need to fight it."

Venture capitalists hope to enhance trade with Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When politicians speak about "an exit policy," they're generally referring to a process of cutting one's losses and running.

When venture capitalists talk about an exit policy, they're also talking about running – but not until they have made boatloads of money enhancing the value of a company.

Earlier this month at the downtown Toronto law office of Gowling Lafleur Henderson LLP, about 70 prospective venture capitalists with ties to Israel gathered to network, trade ideas and see whether they could impress two venture capital managers enough to warrant an investment in their ideas.

The meeting, dubbed the Canada-Israel Venture Capital Initiative, was sponsored by the Canada-Israel Chamber of Commerce (CICC) and the Israel Business Forum, two organizations whose goals include enhancing the business and trade relationship between Canada and Israel.

Leo Lax, founder and managing partner of Skypoint Venture Capital and Yoram Oron, founder and managing partner of Vertex Venture Capital, were the Simon Cowell and Randy Jackson of the event, listening to two entrepreneurs put on a show extolling the virtues of their products as they attempted to convince the investors to put $2 to $5 million into them.

Unlike the personalities on American Idol, Lax and Oron gave no immediate thumbs up or thumbs down evaluations, promising to consider their performances and get back to them in a month. In addition to hearing the two public presentations, Lax and Oron heard from a dozen other new companies in Gowling's board rooms.

With $20 million in capital available for investment, there was a lot at stake for presenters and venture capitalists alike. Oron who flew in from Israel for the event and for a similar one a day later in Ottawa, and Lax, manage private capital funds that invest in early stage businesses. They take an equity stake, assist the management to go to market and once the business is up and running they exit by selling their stakes to larger firms, in the process, they hope, making a healthy return on investment.

Oren Asher, chair of Qnext, and Erez Yerushalmi, president of Inter-Canel, were the entrepreneurs attempting to sell their early stage companies during the public portion of the event. Asher's product is geared for Internet users and boasts that it "is the easiest way to share all of your music, photos, and files with anyone, instantly" on the net. It allows users to send files of unlimited size to contacts on existing instant message and e-mail lists even if the recipients don't have Qnext installed on their computers (www.qnext.com).

Inter-Canel offers an Internet entertainment package for online communities. Yerushalmi focused on the Venice Chronicles, an interactive game geared for the dating community (www.inter-canel.com).

CICC President David Rubin said last week's Venture Capital Initiative was one of a series of new programs initiated by the reinvigorated chamber. The CICC had been dormant for several years until it was relaunched in May 2006 with the encouragement of Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker. The new-look CICC has an executive committee and holds events regularly. It will hire full-time staff, open a permanent office and establish a board of governors and a board of directors, Rubin, a lawyer at Gowlings, said.

CICC's primary goal is to increase business between Canada and Israel. Currently, trade between the two countries is around $1.4 billion annually, not including Israeli investment in Canadian real estate (more than $4 billion (US) in the last four years).

The CICC will promote trade and investment by establishing a social network of business people, sponsor information events, organize business delegations to and from Israel and support government agencies that promote trade.

Rubin said CICC plans to launch an interactive website for its members in the near future that will permit them to exchange information about business opportunities.

A major moment of promise

Last week, the leader of Ontario's Progressive Conservative Party, John Tory, announced that if his party forms the next provincial government, he will "create an opportunity for non-Catholic, faith-based schools to choose to join the publicly funded education system." He added: "There are some things on which you have to stand on principle, and in this case, the principle is fairness to people of other faiths."

With those few but elegantly expressed words, the leader of Ontario's Opposition acknowledged a historic injustice which the Canadian Jewish Congress, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, federation and community leaders in Hamilton and Ottawa, the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools, the Multi-Faith Coalition (in Ontario) and countless individual parents of the thousands of children in Ontario day schools have long sought to remedy.

Tory has brought the decades-old fight for education funding fairness to a watershed moment. He deserves high praise for having having done so. But now we must ensure that we will finally ford the river and get to the other side.

Judging by its initial response to Tory's announcement, it seemed that the government was taken quite by surprise. Senior government media advisor Ben Chin questioned whether "the public system [should be] funding separate schools within its own board." But that is what the public system already does for Catholic schools in Ontario. Moreover, that is what the public system does for faith-based schools in provinces, such as Quebec, where other faith-based schools are funded out of the public purse.

We hope that as the Liberal government has more time to reflect upon the inherent fairness of the Tory proposal, it will adopt it as its own. Justice and fairness should not be a partisan matter.

To be sure, there are valid issues surrounding the public funding of faith-based schools that must be resolved. Education Minister Kathleen Wynne wondered about "the allowance to be made for extra tuition." In addition, the receipt of public funds necessarily calls for appropriate accountability by the schools receiving those funds in matters, for example, of curriculum, teacher credentials, standardized testing and undoubtedly other areas as well.

But these are details. With goodwill on all sides, the implementation issues can be resolved.

Seymour Epstein, executive director of the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education, aptly described Tory's announcement as "a major moment of promise."

It now falls to us to ensure that the promise is fulfilled.

That will require focused and co-ordinated efforts among the widely diverse lay, professional and parent-group supporters of the Tory initiative.

UJA Federation spokesperson Howard English told The CJN, "We believe one of the weaknesses of the struggle we've been waging over 30 years [for education funding] is the mobilization of our own community. And we don't want that weakness to exist again. We're going to be sparing no effort to educate our community and mobilize them on this issue."

At this critical juncture in the fight for fairness in education funding, our major moment of promise, nothing less will do.

Day school funding (1)

It should be noted that the UN Human Rights Committee did not rule that funding for Catholic schools is discriminatory and "out of step with modern times," as the article "PCs promise to fund faith schools" (CJN, June 14) suggested. Rather the committee ruled that if the government funds Catholic schools, it is discriminatory not to fund faith-based schools of other religions on an equivalent basis. As such, binding international law requires that Ontario fund all or none.

Taking funding away from Catholic schools, attended by 675,000 children and supported by all three parties at Queen's Park, would most likely require a constitutional amendment and would force huge numbers of children out of publicly funded and regulated education. The only realistic and fair solution to the discrimination is to extend funding to the small excluded minority of faith-based schools that are not already funded, subject to compliance with provincial standards, as proposed by provincial Progressive Conservative leader John Tory.

This should be supported by all three parties, just as they support Catholic funding. Making publicly funded education more inclusive will benefit everyone.

Day school funding (2)

Two sentences from your reporting on Progressive Conservative leader John Tory's faith based school funding inclusion announcement caught my attention ("PCs promise to fund faith schools" CJN, June 14). They are "Jewish groups… reacted with tempered excitement" and "it is important that we only endorse policy and not any political party or make partisan statements," the second being a quote from Stuart Lewis of the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools.

Sorry folks, I hate to ruin the shivah, but personally I am absolutely ecstatic because of Tory's historic announcement.

Response to Brown (1)

Editor's note: these letters arrived too late to be published before the CJC plenary on June 17. In the interest of fairness, we decided to publish them.

Michael Brown got it right in his guest column "The assisted suicide of CJC: does it matter?" (CJN, June 7). Brown argues against the new proposed system under which the Canadian Jewish Congress' president and senior officers would be appointed by a board consisting of nominees from the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy (CIJA), which will appoint one-quarter of the board, and from federations in Montreal, Toronto and Vancouver, and appointees from Congress' regional offices. One must ask: what is the principled argument against converting a democratic organization into an undemocratic, elected one? Whose interests does this serve? CIJA has done some wonderful work. But far be it from CIJA to take on the added (and undemocratic) role of appointing (read, controlling) CJC, as well. CJC has a distinguished history and is too important an organization to become a puppet of any other organization.

Bravo Michael Brown. You hit the nail on the head in your guest column "The assisted suicide of CJC: does it matter?" (CJN, June 7). Brown poses the question, "Should we laugh or cry?" Let me assure you this is no laughing matter. I urge all to cry – cry in a loud voice against Bylaw 67, which implements the "assisted suicide" that Brown refers to. Jerry Falwell espoused 'bigoted' views

The CJN should be chastised for publishing Joseph Ben-Ami's letter ("Falwell supported the Jewish people", letters, May 31) extolling the virtues of the late Rev. Jerry Falwell. Rev. Falwell was a divisive figure in American religious and political life, driving the country further to the right by espousing bigoted and exclusionary views. It is true that he was a "friend" to the Jewish people and to the State of Israel, but his rants against others not of his kind diminishes any kinship we might feel with him. Intolerance of any kind should be condemned, not extolled.

With Barak back, is Kadima in trouble?

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

In the short term, the election of Ehud Barak as Labor party leader could give Prime Minister Ehud Olmert's ailing government a new lease on life. In the longer term, it could mark the beginning of the end for Olmert's Kadima party and the return of Labor and Likud as the two main actors in Israeli politics.

For long stretches of the campaign Ayalon, a straight-talking former navy commander and Shin Bet security services chief, held the lead and was touted as the party's great new hope. But eventually his inexperience counted against him.

Barak won 51.2 per cent of the vote to Ayalon's 47.7 per cent, with the rest of the ballots blank or spoiled. Of the party's 103,000 members, 67,000 turned out to vote.

A former chief of staff, Barak is slated to replace outgoing Labor leader Amir Peretz as defence minister. He vowed to do all he could to enhance Israel's military capacity after the blow to the Israel Defence Forces' image in last summer's Second Lebanon War.

Barak clearly hopes to use the defence portfolio to re-establish himself as a credible candidate for prime minister. Olmert hopes that bringing in the seasoned Barak as defence minister, coupled with a wider cabinet reshuffle, will help restore public confidence in his leadership.

But while Olmert sees an alliance with Barak as a way to retain power, Barak views an alliance with Olmert as a way to re-emerge as a major force in Israeli politics. In short, while Olmert and Barak's short-term interests coincide, in the longer term they are likely to clash.

Pundits say that by mid-2008 Barak will want to trigger new elections that could return Labor to power. The pundits predict that his major rival then will not be Olmert, or anyone else in Kadima, but Benjamin Netanyahu of Likud. A Barak-Netanyahu race would be a rematch from 1999, when Barak toppled Netanyahu to become prime minster.

Although Barak says Olmert must go as prime minister if Labor is to stay in the government, most observers think he will not insist. Much will depend on the findings in the Winograd Commission's full report scheduled to be published in August.

The interim report condemned the Olmert government's handling of the war against Hezbollah. Another scathing account could force Olmert to step down. But even if he stays, Barak won't be in any hurry to surrender the powerful defence portfolio he sees as his ticket to regaining the premiership he lost so ignominiously to Ariel Sharon in February 2001.

Barak modelled his campaign tactics on those employed by Sharon: playing the distant elder statesman, mainly by resisting press interviews and not saying anything substantive on any of the major issues.

In the campaign, Barak stuck to two messages: that he would make the best defence minister at a time when Israel might well be tested again and that he is the one man able to defeat Netanyahu.

Barak's electoral weakness was his poor record as prime minister from 1999 to 2001. But by refusing to meet the press, he was able to keep that largely out of the public eye.

Barak came to power in July 1999 on a wave of public optimism. There was a great expectation that he would have the strength to build on the Oslo peace process and bring the Israeli-Arab conflict to an end. But he failed to strike deals with the Syrians in Shepherdstown, W. Va., in January 2000 and with the Palestinians at Camp David in July.

Instead of peace, Israelis found themselves confronted with a seemingly endless wave of Palestinian terror. Barak claimed to have revealed the "true face" of former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat and the fact that Israel had no real partner for peace. Critics accused him of failing to exploit a great opportunity to change Israel's regional status.

After losing to Sharon by a landslide in January 2001, Barak left politics for business. Many Israelis resented the use of his experience as prime minister to get rich. Others could not forgive his arrogance as prime minister and his perceived political ineptitude.

Just one year ago, Barak was seen as one of the most hated people in Israeli public life. The former prime minister had seemed so down and out in Israeli politics, Ha'aretz political analyst Yossi Verter hailed his victory last week as "not just another political comeback" but as a truly miraculous "raising of the dead."

Barak started his campaign for Labor leader well behind Ayalon and several other candidates.

He was helped by the Labor party's lopsided electorate. More than 20 per cent comes from kibbutzim and moshavim, which constitute less than four per cent of the general public, and another 20 per cent is made up of Israeli Arabs and Druze, many of whom will probably not vote for Labor in a general election.

Barak, therefore, may have won an unlikely party victory, but he still has a long way to go to re-establish his political credentials in the country as a whole.

Presidency rounds off Peres' 66-year career

By SHAHAR ILAN and AMIRAM BARKAT
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Shimon Peres was elected Israel's ninth president last Thursday, capping a six-decade political career in which he has held almost every senior government post.

He will be sworn into office on July 15 for a seven-year term, replacing the disgraced Moshe Katsav, who faces multiple allegations of sexual assault against female staffers.

Speaking at the Knesset after the second and final round of voting, the beaming 83-year-old thanked his family and the lawmakers who supported him, and pledged to "give my all to serve Israel."

With the announcement of his election for president, Peres ceased to be a Knesset member, after 48 consecutive years, and is no longer deputy prime minister.

Peres won 86 votes in a second-round ballot, after his two rivals in the race threw their support to him. In the first round, he fell three votes shy of the 61 needed to clinch the presidency.

* * *

A Nobel Peace Prize, three brief stints as prime minister, ministerial posts in 12 cabinets and continuous parliamentary membership since the Fourth Knesset – those are the highlights of Shimon Peres' 66-year career in Israeli public life, which he is about to cap off with the presidency.

What is unusual about Peres' biography is not just his accomplishments to date, but the fact that Peres, who has written 11 books and has promoted the development of Israel's security industry, never attended university or served in the army. He has also managed to survive a series of political losses.

Peres was born Shimon Persky on Aug. 2, 1923, in eastern Poland. He moved to Israel with his family in 1934, attended the Ben-Shemen Agricultural School and became one of the founders of Kibbutz Alumot, where he worked as a dairy farmer, shepherd and secretary.

Peres embarked on public life in 1941, when he was appointed secretary general of the Hanoar Haoved Vehalomed youth movement. He married Sonia in 1945, and they now have three children, eight grandchildren and two great-grandchildren. Peres met his political patron – Israel's first prime minister, David Ben-Gurion – in 1947, while Peres was working at the headquarters of the Haganah pre-state army. Peres became the Defence Ministry's director general in 1953, at the age of 29. He was elected to the Knesset for the first time in 1959 and was appointed deputy defence minister, a position he held until 1965.

In the 16 years of his involvement in security affairs, Peres put his stamp on the establishment of military industry, the development of security ties with France and the founding of the nuclear reactor in Dimona.

In 1965, Peres began a new chapter in his life when he quit the Mapai party, the forerunner of Labor, and became the secretary general of Ben-Gurion's new party, Rafi. Two years later, after Rafi bombed in the elections, Peres went off on his own to become one of the founders of the Labor party, which brought together the Rafi, Mapai and Ahdut Ha'avoda parties. Between 1969 and 1974, Peres served as minister in both of Golda Meir's governments. He was appointed defence minister in 1974, after losing the Labor leadership race to Yitzhak Rabin. During his term, Peres presided over the successful rescue of Israeli hostages in Entebbe and Uganda, and allowed the Gush Emunim settlement movement to settle in the West Bank.

In February 1977, after Rabin's government fell, Peres lost his second race against Rabin for the Labor leadership, but took Rabin's place two months later when Rabin resigned in the wake of scandal. Peres lost the premiership to Menachem Begin of the Likud and ran unsuccessfully against Begin again in a stormy 1981 race.

In 1984, amid wild inflation and the Lebanon War, Peres formed a unity government with Yitzhak Shamir of the Likud. Peres, who served as prime minister in the first two years of the government, was behind the emergency plan to stabilize the economy and the partial withdrawal from Lebanon.

A Peres-led Labor party became a junior partner in another unity government headed by Shamir in 1988. Two years later, in the wake of Shamir's refusal to advance the peace process, Peres led what is known as the "stinking manoeuvre," an attempt to topple the Shamir government. The government fell in a no-confidence vote, but Peres failed in his efforts to form a government himself. In February 1992, Peres lost the Labor leadership to Rabin for the third time but was appointed foreign minister when the party won the general elections.

Peres led the Oslo accords process in 1993 and signed the initial peace deal with the current Palestinian Authority president Mahmoud Abbas. In 1994, after a lobbying campaign, Peres was added as the third recipient of the Nobel Peace Prize, along with Rabin and former Palestinian president Yasser Arafat. Peres was identified with the vision of "a new Middle East," based on a peace founded upon co-operation and economic development.

After Rabin was assassinated in November 1995, Peres filled in as prime minister until the next elections, which he lost to the Likud's Benjamin Netanyahu.

Peres ran unsuccessfully against Moshe Katsav for president in 2000. He led the Labor party several times between 2001 and 2005 and served in the cabinet under Ariel Sharon. Peres quit Labor in 2005 to join Kadima after losing to Amir Peretz in the primary.

No one will hand you a crown

We might be raised like princes, yet we don't know how to become kings.

We are raised to expect a steady stream of entitlements. Go to school, get your degree, then there's suburban bliss waiting for you. Indulged and spoiled, princes like us think we'll inevitably become a king.

But that's wrong. No one is going to hand you a crown. Birthright doesn't determine who is a true king.

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

Even some who are lucky enough to be handed the keys to the kingdom fail. Plenty of people inherit wealth, fame and beauty, yet still fail miserably. The old proverb "from shirtsleeves to shirtsleeves in three generations" is all too often true. Plenty of princes are handed crowns, but fail because they have no idea what it takes to be a king.

So, what does it take to be a king?

Chutzpah.

Chutzpah gets a bad rap. It's become another word for "impolite" or "obnoxious." In actuality, chutzpah is the secret to becoming a king.

The Talmud says "chutzpah is like a king without the crown." There are multitudes of people who never discover their inner king. They wait in vain for others to recognize their abilities. They sit quietly hoping that someone will just hand them a crown.

The Talmud is telling wallflowers to stand up and take charge. Chutzpah means never accepting limitations. Don't politely accept mediocrity as your lot in life. If you want to be a king, grab hold of your destiny.

Rebecca and Stuart Klein have a lot of chutzpah, and they've refused to follow conventional wisdom on how to live their lives. Both are disabled (he's quadriplegic, she's paraplegic), and yet they are married and the parents of twin baby boys.

Conventional wisdom finds this act of chutzpah intolerable. As noted in a 2005 article in the Los Angeles Times, some people who meet the Kleins can't resist saying: "You're going to have your hands full," or "It's going to get really hard when they're older."

These comments perplex Stuart.

"Why say how hard it's going to be?" Stuart asks. "What's the point? If they say it in a certain way, and then say, 'OK, we'll come over and help you out,' that's one thing, but otherwise, what are they suggesting?" Then he adds a characteristic joke, "Should we put them up on eBay now or wait till they're older?"

But the Kleins are kings. They have the gift of chutzpah. It doesn't matter how hard things are or what other people think. They have grabbed hold of their own destiny.

Perhaps most men, but not kings. True kings have chutzpah and don't wait for others to hand them a crown.

Remembering a rose that bloomed

Susi Shoshana Cohen died earlier this month at the age of 100. My wife's maternal grandmother, she was a living link to the immigrant generation, the uprooted millions who joined the miraculous mass migration from the perils of eastern Europe to the wonders of North America. It's an amazing epoch in Jewish history, North American history, and human history.

Gil Troy in Montreal

Susi Cohen's particular epic began on Jan. 1, 1907, in Brailla, Romania. One of six children born to an innkeeper, she would remember Romania as a land of natural beauty and rough conditions. During the Holocaust, Susi, by now married and the mother of her only child, Annie, lived in Bucharest.

While others suffered under the anti-Semitic regime, Susi remembered a few restrictions but more often spoke of Bucharest's grandeur. The family resisted the identity of "survivor," out of respect for the Jews in other parts of Romania and Europe who suffered horribly in ghettoes and concentration camps.

Ironically, their greatest wartime trauma came from the Americans, who bombed Bucharest because of Romania's alliance with Nazi Germany. Their house was burned, destroying Annie's trousseau, the clothes and linens a family prepared for an expectant bride. By 1947, the postwar rise of Communism made life for the family unbearable. One day, the three left their house, turned the key, and walked away from their possessions and their life in Romania.

The family tried to reach Palestine, to participate in the great adventure of rebuilding a Jewish state, but the British blockade rerouted them to Cyprus. They spent months in a displaced persons camp learning Hebrew. They arrived in Israel shortly after the state was declared in May 1948.

Reunited with a sister who had moved in the 1930s to what became Israel, Susi and her family lived in Jaffa. Conditions were harsh during and after the War of Independence. Susi's brother-in-law died in battle, and Susi cared for her grieving sister, two young nieces, her daughter, and her husband, who never acclimated to the heat and the tumult of an embattled state in formation. After a few years, the family made the difficult choice to leave Israel, something Susi's daughter regretted deeply.

The family soon settled in Canada, along with hundreds of thousands of other refugees. Collectively and individually, these immigrants built extraordinary lives and developed impressive communities. Susi would live to see her daughter marry, prosper, and raise four children, who themselves produced eleven grandchildren. North America's freedoms and openness offered tremendous opportunities to Susi's clan. She would see her family thrive in real estate, psychology, chemistry, law and nursing.

In the final phase of her life, Susi became a pioneer in the modern quest to find dignity as we age. In Romania, in the 1920s, she studied art – and three paintings from that period survive, thanks to the sister who migrated to Palestine and brought them there.

Like so many women of her generation, Susi stopped painting once she got married. When Susi's husband died in 1979, Susi's daughter recommended that she take an art class. For the next 27 years, until her eyesight failed her, Susi painted. Most impressively, she grew as an artist, improving her technique and tackling more sophisticated subjects.

Today, many homes in Canada, the United States and Israel boast "Grandma Susi" landscapes – an eloquent tribute to an immigrant's grit, a democratic country's warm embrace, and the creative zeal of this irrepressible artistic spirit.

We are also blessed by my wife's foresight in videotaping Susi's "ethical will" and memoirs last year. Beautifully filmed and edited by Iris Wagner of Memoir Productions, we have a video to supplement the beautiful pictures, warm memories and legacy of freedom that Susi bequeathed.

Susi's Hebrew name, Shoshana, means rose. The name fit her, offering an apt metaphor for her generation too. Often rooted in foreign soil, roses frequently end up adorning different locations. And while necessity forces them to be tough, even prickly, growing thorns early on, they are best remembered for their blossoming, flourishing themselves while enriching us all with their hard-earned, but infectious, loveliness.

Susi Cohen's life was and is a blessing to so many who luxuriated in her art, her goodness, her values, her life story, which was so typical of her generation yet unique in its own ways, too.

Book week for the people of the book

A trip to celebrate my nephew Yoni's wedding brought me to Israel during the nation's annual Shavua Hasefer, a week-long book fair.

If you've never been fortunate enough to be in Israel for Shavua Hasefer, you haven't seen the literary fever that grips Israelis of all political stripes and ethnicities – youngest to oldest, secular to haredi. Book exhibitions spring up in shopping malls, town centres, pedestrian areas of large cities, green spaces of development towns. Everyone, it seems, flocks to tables that buckle under the weight of the volumes representing the richness and diversity of the country's publishing industry.

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

Amid impending primaries in the Labor Party, continued conflagration in Gaza and ongoing shelling of the Israeli town of Sderot, reported talks with Syria about the Golan, and the daily tensions and pleasures that make up Israeli life, the passion for reading speaks volumes.

Booksellers hawk their wares, offering tempting discounts on stacks that seem constantly replenished: sifrei kodesh (sacred texts), brightly coloured children's books, pot-boilers and thrillers, contemporary fiction, political analyses, cookbooks, travel books, world literature in translation. No one, it seems, walks away empty-handed.

Each exhibition space takes on its own characteristics that are particular to its locale. A haredi Jerusalem neighbourhood, for example, features separate hours for women and men, respectively, with loudspeakers warning each gender to complete their purchases before their designated time runs out. In a developing settlement in the Negev – where burgeoning families live in "caravans," or temporary trailer-like homes – Shavua Hasefer rolls in as the event of the week, with books for children and for their parents.

In a book exhibit set up in the parking lot of a large shopping outlet, a youngish grandfather tells his 10 grandchildren, ranging in age from two months to 12 years, that they may each select a book (in the case of the youngest, the older siblings make the selection). He himself debates between a new analysis of the Six Day War and the autobiography of a former chief rabbi.

As for me, I was struck by the intense literary and intellectual activity represented by the fair, by the snapshot of a country that comes to know itself and to actualize itself through the intense activities of writing and reading. I leafed through books by contemporary Israeli literary authors – venerable fiction writers such as Amos Oz, A.B. Yehoshua, Ida Fink, and Aharon Appelfeld; established, hip writers such as David Grossman and Orly Kastel-Blum; and edgy young writers such as Etgar Keret.

The effusion of political writing was particularly apparent. Forty years after the Six Day War, journalists, pundits and military analysts, along with former fighters and commanders of that war, look back on its legacy and consequences. Less than a year after the 2006 conflagration in Lebanon, there are already a plethora of books analyzing that war, critiquing the government's state of readiness and direction. What many of the books record is devastating, but at the same time, the books give evidence of a thriving and vigorous democracy, freedom of speech and the press, honest self-scrutiny, and investment in the future.

Who can resist the offers: buy now, at 20 per cent off, or buy two, get a third free. But really, who can resist the books themselves, the invitation to learn, to challenge, to imagine. Perhaps because I am a literature professor, the book vendors seem to sense that I can't resist their offers. They bring me volume after volume: if you like this author, you'll like that one; this novel received stunning reviews; that exposé is the scandal of the moment; this memoir is an entré into the life of haredi women, that one a poignant account of childhood under Nazism.

Most remarkable of all, of course, is the sheer fact that a book fair is such a hot attraction. The phenomenon of book publishing and readership altogether in Israel is astonishing. Not without reason, we often think of Israel as a country of action, movement, and sound. Shavua Hasefer is the visible sign of a different aspect of the country – a contemplative mode, a people that think and dream.

The Kirshner File

Israel's never-ending problems in Gaza

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

A year after the Israeli army launched a limited ground offensive into the Gaza Strip to free an abducted soldier and end the firing of Qassam rockets at adjacent settlements, Israel is frustratingly back to square one. A week-and-a-half ago, in an eerie and ominous replay of last year's incident, Palestinian gunmen from Gaza broke through a border fence in a bold but failed attempt to kidnap yet another Israeli soldier.

The attempted kidnapping underscored the fact that Israel is astonishingly vulnerable and faces an enormous security problem in the south. Or as Prime Minister Ehud Olmert admitted after the most recent outbreak of tit-for-tat cross-border violence – which claimed the lives of two Israeli civilians in the development town of Sderot – there are no "magical solutions" and Israelis should prepare themselves for "a long confrontation."

Indeed, Israel can expect nothing but trouble and heartache in the foreseeable future, given the absence of a formal peace agreement with the Palestinians. And in light of last week's internecine fighting in Gaza between Hamas and Fatah – during which Hamas fighters seized control of Gaza and Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas disbanded the three-month-old unity government and fired the Hamas-aligned prime minister, Ismail Haniyeh – the situation has deteriorated and become still more uncertain and precarious.

It is now official. The Palestinians are engaged in a civil war, and Gaza, always a hotbed of terrorism, has morphed into a full-fledged Hamas base.

A festering sore on the body politic of the region, Gaza has always posed problems for Israel. Prior to the Six Day War, Palestinian fedayeen operating from Gaza periodically attacked Israel. As an occupying power after 1967, Israel faced resentment and resistance from the Palestinians, many of whom were refugees who had lost homes and property during the nakba, the 1948 war.

In the wake of Israel's unilateral withdrawal from Gaza in the summer of 2005, there was a soothing lull, a short-lived period of tranquility. But by 2006, following the formation of an Islamic fundamentalist Hamas government in the Palestinian Authority and continuing lawlessness and disorder in Gaza, the Qassams started raining down on Israel once more.

Last year, on June 25, a band of armed Palestinians affiliated with Hamas, the Popular Resistance Committee and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade stormed an Israeli army post and killed two soldiers and captured a third, Gilad Shalit. In response, Israel launched a series of raids, backed by pinpoint air strikes, into Gaza. The operations lasted for more than a month, only slowing after Israel got bogged down in a 34-day war with Hezbollah in the north. Israel inflicted pain on the Palestinians, but accomplished little. Shalit was not found, and he remains imprisoned despite several rounds of negotiations to release him, and the Qassam threat still looms large.

In November, Israel and Hamas agreed to observe a truce in Gaza, but not in the West Bank. Incidents instigated by Islamic Jihad and the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, an offshoot of Fatah, marred the tenuous ceasefire, though Hamas all but honoured it. Three months ago, Israel accused Hamas of arming Islamic Jihad, turning a blind eye to Qassam launchings and planning imminent terrorist attacks.

On April 24, after Israeli forces killed nine Palestinian militants in the West Bank, Hamas itself broke the shaky ceasefire by shelling Israel. The massive missile and mortar barrage coincided with celebrations marking Israel's 59th anniversary of statehood. Olmert remained calm, saying that Israel would hew to its policy of restraint, an element of last November's truce. As these developments unfolded, Abbas, who until last week was a junior partner in the Palestinian government headed by Hamas, assured Israel that Hamas' ceasefire violations would not be repeated. But in mid-May, Hamas opened a new offensive, lobbing a succession of Qassams into Israel and thereby proving that Abbas wielded little influence and was as weak as ever.

During these hostilities, scores of Israeli civilians were wounded and, in a stark and disconcerting illustration of Israel's vulnerability, thousands were evacuated to safer locales, both by the government and a Russian-born billionaire. Many factories in the vicinity were damaged, underscoring the steep economic price Israel has paid for the breakdown of the truce. In reply, Israel abandoned its restraint and took aim at Hamas bases, offices and Qassam rocket crews. Israel also arrested Hamas officials, including the minister of education, and reinstituted its policy of targeted assassinations. By mid-June, with the Palestinians locked in bitter internal strife, there was a dramatic decline in the number of Qassam launchings and Israeli reprisals, but the situation was hardly optimal.

For Israel, the renewal of shelling last month was a sobering experience. A nuclear power with the strongest army in the Middle East, Israel still has no defence against short-range missiles, either on the Gaza or Lebanese front.

Since the spring of 2001, a year after the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising, the Palestinians have fired almost 5,000 rockets and mortars at Israel. Without a doubt, the Palestinians have learned by example from Hezbollah that there are chinks in Israel's armour and that rockets, however crude, can shake Israel's self-confidence. It costs the Palestinians only a few dollars to fire a single Qassam, but Israel will have to spend tens of thousands of dollars to intercept a missile, should it be able to build an effective defence system.

The gloom thickens when one considers that the Palestinians have been improving the range and firepower of the Qassams. If they manage to place Israel's coastal plain in their crosshairs, leaving Tel Aviv and Ben-Gurion Airport at risk, Israel would have to respond, plunging the region into chaos.

Since Israel's pullout from Gaza, the Palestinians, particularly Hamas, have upgraded their operational capacity. Aping Hezbollah, Hamas has constructed fortified bunkers and tunnels and smuggled upwards of 30 tons of weapons-grade explosives, surface-to-surface missiles and sophisticated anti-tank missiles into Gaza. Egypt, which is supposed to monitor the frontier, has largely failed to staunch the flow.

Another cause of concern is that Hamas has dispatched hundreds of fighters to Iran for high-quality military training. Lest it be forgotten, Iran already sends financial aid to Hamas, pursues a nuclear program on an urgent basis and openly and ardently calls for Israel's uprooting and destruction. Yuval Diskin, the director of the Shin Bet, Israel's domestic intelligence agency, has warned that these Iranian-trained operatives could wreak havoc should Israel invade Gaza. Israel's chief of staff, Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi, has suggested that Israel may have no alternative but to carry out a limited invasion to deal with the Qassams much more effectively. But in an oblique reference to Operation Defensive Shield, which was launched into the West Bank in the spring of 2002, Ashkenazi has voiced opposition to a full-scale invasion.

Olmert and Defence Minister Amir Peretz – who resigned last week and was replaced by Ehud Barak – have ruled out a big ground offensive as well, while Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni has said that it would empower Palestinian extremists who oppose a Palestinian rapprochement with Israel. Gen. Shlomo Brom, the former director of the Israel Defence Force's strategic planning bureau, has written that a major invasion and re-occupation would be too costly in terms of Israeli military and Palestinian civilian casualties and would saddle Israel with the responsibility of providing essential services to the Palestinians.

Barring an invasion, Israel may opt for less intrusive military methods, as the chief of Israel's southern command, Gen. Yoav Gallant, has said. Alternatively, as Olmert and Livni have intimated and United Nations Secretary General Ban Ki-moon has called for, Israel may invite international peacekeepers to patrol the Philadelphi route, the narrow corridor between Gaza and Egypt.

Toronto's Mayor Miller addresses Israel Bonds

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

The municipal government needs to ensure that local businesses remain prosperous, said Toronto Mayor David Miller at a luncheon sponsored by State of Israel Bonds, builder's division.

"Unless we have economic success, nothing else is possible. [The city] depends on the business community," he said last week.

He told the capacity crowd at Arcadian Court that there are many children in the city who do not share the dream that others their age take for granted.

"How can these kids dream of a future when [Torontonians] quite unintentionally allow poverty [to exist?] We need to share our prosperity."

Miller said studies point to the fact that businesses succeed in a city where employees want to live. "It is incumbent upon the government to ensure that [Toronto] is livable. [All residents] need to enjoy a quality [of life.]"

One "bold but necessary strategy" is Toronto's Change Is In The Air policy, a commitment to engage the public on the issue of climate change and determine how the city will meet its greenhouse gas and air-pollution reduction targets.

The framework provides ideas on the strategies, policies, programs and projects needed to meet the city's targets, and identifies 27 potential actions that the government, residents, businesses and industry can take to tackle climate change and improve air quality.

"We're not doing this just to meet my goal of being green, but [rather] because it is the right thing to do," Miller said.

Citing Tridel's commitment to develop 12 new green condominium communities throughout the Greater Toronto Area, and its creation of a model eco-suite, Miller said the company has demonstrated the financial advantages of "going green."

He said transportation issues arise in a city that is a hub of economic development, and Toronto is in the midst of finding a solution.

"The TTC is a great system for a city with a population of 1.5 million, but we have 2.5 million. [The system] must be expanded."

He mentioned the city's "Transit City" plan, which is based on the premise of developing a widely spaced network of electric light-rail lines, each on its own right of way. In total, 120 kilometres of service will be added over the entire city, and by 2021, the new lines would carry 175 million riders a year.

The challenges faced by the TTC are mirrored on many fronts, Miller said. "More people live in public housing now than live in Prince Edward Island, and since my election the population has grown by the same number of people that live in Peterborough. Revenue, though, does not grow along with it.

"We also have to invest in the library system because young people are crying out for the knowledge available in libraries, and they also need parks and recreation centres."

Some funds can be generated "if we leave some of the tax revenues created in the city, in the city. Cities challenged by tremendous growth must get their share of the revenue."

The city's One Cent Now campaign, he said, addresses this challenge by asking the federal government to return one cent of the existing six cent GST, which would currently amount to about $410 million for the city, as a reliable and permanent source of funding that grows as the economy grows.

We need to face all our challenges he said, "so our house [remains] big enough for the next generation."

Also, at the luncheon, farewell was said to Israeli trade commissioner Ephraim Shoham.

Leo Baeck Students visit Bloorview

Clarification

The story "Ontario PCs promise to fund faith schools" (June 14) referred to an Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools event held at the recent Progressive Conservative policy conference as a "Shabbat dinner." The CJN wishes to clarify that the event was a Shabbaton.

* * *

Correction

In the article "Zareinu works toward erecting own building" (CJN, June 7), the sentence that identified Randy Spiegel - organizers hope the moveathon will bring in more than $1 million, said the school's executive director Randy Spiegel – was inadvertently omitted. The CJN regrets the error.

LIVING LEGACIES: Grade 6 students at Thornhill Woods Public School recently unveiled their Living Legacies project, a multimedia exhibit that tells the stories of individual Holocaust survivors now living at Baycrest's Apotex Jewish Home for the Aged and Baycrest Terraces. About 35 survivors, 70 students, and friends and families attended the unveiling held at Baycrest. Each survivor's story is told via DVD, PowerPoint presentation, posters and documentary video, all created by the students. The students will present a disc of each survivor's life story to Baycrest for inclusion in the resident's chart, and copies will be available to their families. Shown is Holocaust survivor Fela Karmiol admiring her poster. With her are her student partners, Taylor, left, and Amanda, right, both 12. "It was an amazing experience," beamed Amanda. "I got a different perspective of the elderly. It made me more aware," Taylor said. [Baycrest photo]

Landmark sign in limbo as Sam's closes

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It is a staple on Yonge Street, a source of pride for Torontonians and one of the greatest Canadian Jewish success stories to date.

But at the end of the month, music retailer Sam the Record Man is throwing in the towel for good.

Because of the growing trend of downloading music online and being unable to compete with big box stores such as Wal-Mart and HMV, Bobby and Jason Sniderman, the sons of Sam Sniderman, who built the record store empire, decided to call it quits.

When Bobby Sniderman spoke to The CJN last week, he said he didn't want people to see this as a tragic end of an era, but as a celebration of a decades-old family business that brought joy and pride to generations of Canadians.

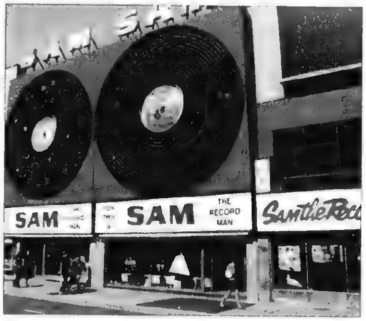
"This is not a sad story. This is like if your zaide had a wonderful life and lived to be 95 years old and had a rich life, and took care of his family. And when he passed away, you say, 'what a wonderful person, what a great life he had.' You wouldn't think it was tragic," Sniderman said.

Sam's history, rooted in the heart of a Toronto Jewish neighbourhood, began at the start of the 20th century with a dream that so many shared.

"People came to this country with tremendous dreams and hopes of building a future for themselves and their families, and we were able to distinguish ourselves by running a good business, taking care of people, taking care of our staff and taking care of the community… I think there are many people in the Jewish community who have done that as well," he said.

"It was started by my grandmother, Gertrude and my uncle Sid. They were originally a car-radio installation shop, installing car radios in Model T Fords. It then grew into selling appliances. It was a hard goods store, selling TVs and refrigerators and stoves and radios and things. My father, who was 13 years my uncle's junior, he… wanted to attract a girl who lived in the neighbourhood. The store was at 714 College St., which was in the heart of the Jewish district at the time, just down from Kensington and Spadina [avenues]."

He said that by 1937, when his father was 17, he convinced his brother and mother to let him sell records in a small kiosk in the family appliance store.



"[He did this] to attract a girl who he actually married, and here I am now, 70 years later. Had they not allowed him to put in a record kiosk, I probably wouldn't be talking to you today," he said with a laugh.

Eventually, the records began outselling the appliances, and in 1961, they moved to Yonge Street and closed the College Street store.

Just eight years later, a national Sam the Record Man franchise chain was established, and at one point there were more than 130 stores across the country.

But by the late 1990s, business began to slow, and just a year after Sam retired in 2000, the store declared bankruptcy.

Sam the Record Man, known for its blowout Boxing Day sales, walls covered with autographs by music industry greats and the giant neon signs of records that give the area a mini-Times Square feel, could no longer adapt to the changing record industry.

In an attempt to resurrect it, Bobby and Jason reopened the store in 2002.

"It started out as a couple of brothers, my uncle Sid and my father Sam… and it was turned over to two other brothers and we did our best for five years, but we just can't compete with technology," Sniderman said.

"Music has become a commodity like water. You turn on your tap and you think you're going to get water, and you turn on your computer and you expect to get music… The evolution of delivering music has gone from vinyl to tape to CD and now it's through cellphones and iPods and computers. The role of the record retailer is simply being phased out."

Although the store will see its last day on June 30, it doesn't seem as if Sam will soon be forgotten. He was admired by many in the Canadian music industry and was known for his enthusiasm when it came to supporting local talent.

He helped promote Canadian music legends including Anne Murray and Gordon Lightfoot, and in 1976, he was made a member of the Order of Canada.

"My father really distinguished himself through the support of Canadian talent when so many other people were not interested. He devoted his life to that and continues to work with Canadian artists," he said.

Perhaps one of the biggest area of concern for Torontonians is what will be done with the famous neon signs that have been a staple of Yonge Street since the 1960s.

"The signs are really an integral part of Yonge street and probably one of the most recognized symbols there… There was an idea that we should take the signs off the side of the building and put them in Dundas Square," Sniderman said.

Facebook, an online network, has a group with more than 17,000 members who are campaigning to save the signs.

"Forget the CN Tower, that Sam the Record Man sign is Toronto, period," said one Facebooker.

"I was born in [Toronto]. Didn't go to the CN Tower 'til I was in my 20s, didn't go to the zoo 'til two weeks ago with my son's class, but I shopped at Sam's from birth! Please don't take it away! Keep the record spinning!" wrote another.

Despite the announcement that Sam's is closing, Sniderman isn't willing to completely close the book on this legacy just yet.

"We're not attached to bricks and mortars… There is a possibility that the brand could be resurrected in some form in another location… We had a great business, we did a lot of great things. This is not a sad story. It is just a story that isn't going to continue in the present location that we have."

A Place for Inclusive Public Education

The province of Ontario offers millions of children excellent educational opportunities, including those available at publicly funded Catholic schools.

Now it's time to include Jewish day schools and other faith-based schools within Ontario's publicly funded education system, as long as they meet provincial standards.

Many agree. They include the Ontario Progressive Conservative party, individual members of other political parties, the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools, and Armenian, Muslim and Sikh organizations.

For contact information visit: www.electionsontario.on.ca/fyed/en/form_page_en.jsp and for any questions or comments about this issue, please write to inclusiveeducation@ujafed.org.

Clearly the time has come to strengthen both faith-based schools and the public school system.

It's the Ontario way and the Canadian way.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Dethroning the sovereign self

By RABBI ROY TANENBAUM

Rabbinic Reflections

In the Jew Within, a sociological study of contemporary American Jewish life, professors Steven Cohen and Arnold Eisen coined a phrase to describe the typical American Jew's approach to Judaism: "the sovereign self."

Although family, community and social norms can have an impact, the "sovereign self" feels free to approach Judaism with his or her own sense of authority and with no sense of communal or divine boundaries, autonomously pulling together congenial elements just as one might order a Dell computer, choosing the components one needs. What is not chosen as "speaking to me" can be regarded as mere Jewish hang-ups, negative ethnocentricity or products of a bygone era.

Such Jews are not abandoning their Jewish identity. They do, however, assume the authority to constantly change it. Nothing is set. There is journey, but no destination. The boundaries between Jew and non-Jew may frequently be found to be insignificant. Personal happiness is the key.

The implications are staggering, not the least of which is that, with no coherent structure or tradition, it is difficult for the subsequent generations to replicate their parents' journey. And if Judaism can assume whatever form any "sovereign self" at one moment or another decides it to be, or can be sculpted and re-sculpted to fit any political agenda, Judaism is left bereft of any content at all. Further, if everything is defined by the "sovereign self," Jewish institutions become irrelevant.

To be fair, it should be made clear that Cohen and Eisen are not advocating such an approach. Rather, they are describing how they have found contemporary Jews to be, for the most part, already functioning.

The "sovereign self" contrasts with the traditional view of authority, "the yoke of Heavenly Sovereignty, Ol malchut shamayim." What is the nafka mina, the basic distinction?

The "sovereign self" (and his work, career, politics or "material success") comprises his own measure of all beliefs and practices – the definition of what a Jew is. But with my acceptance of Heavenly Sovereignty, I feel measured by an eternal standard. As measured against such a standard, I can see myself as a "good Jew" or, conversely, as a "poor Jew," thus enabling me to strive for greater practice and growth. I am indeed on a journey, but the journey has a direction beyond me.

Regarding individual standing, not everything goes. For instance, from biblical days, contact with the dead makes one ritually impure. Judaism is to be a religion of life, not of necromancy, a form of idolatry. If one had become ritually impure through contact with the dead, before being fit to participate again in the Temple rites, one had to undergo a ceremony of purification that included being sprinkled with a solution made from a red heifer. The entire process is traditionally considered to be a mystery.

Let us take a stab at unravelling the mystery. The prescribed animal must be "female," "of birthing age," "totally red," "completely unblemished" and must "never have been yoked" – which, following Rabbi Samson Raphael Hirsch, are all metaphors for life, potency and personal moral freedom of will, entirely the opposite of death, and, therefore, its antidote.

Taking just one, the yoke in question is not just being worked with a yoke, but the animal is disqualified even if it has been dressed in a yoke. That is, any temporal yoke (personal work, career, politics, or even the drive for material "success") cannot purify us for ritual purposes. The implication is that, with our God-like powers of mastering worldly matter, we must liberate ourselves from all such yokes and freely place the use of these powers under the mastery of God.

Our society sorely lacks the Divine perspective. One who has freely appropriated a sense of Divine commandedness will always discover within him or herself shortcomings that demand improvement. However, one who considers oneself sovereign is fundamentally one's own god, and no idolatry is more destructive than self-veneration.

Jewish youth should experience Kotel: rabbi

By RHONDA SPIVAK

Special to The CJN

WINNIPEG — Thirty community leaders met Rabbi Shmuele Rabinowitz, the rabbi of the Western Wall and Holy Sites, at a dinner organized by the Jewish National Fund.

Last year, six million people came to the Kotel. "Every person who comes to pray at the Kotel, whether they are Jewish or not, whether they are religiously observant or not, is equal," said Rabbi Rabinowitz, at the dinner held at the Fort Gary Hotel.

Rabbi Rabinovitz and Mordechai Eliav, the executive director of the Western Wall Foundation visited Toronto as well as Winnipeg, to raise funds for the foundation. One of the aims of the foundation is to bring more children to the Kotel for life-cycle events such as bar mitzvahs. Currently, there are approximately 200 bar mitzvahs a day at the Kotel.

"We see the assimilation in the Diaspora, and the more we can connect people to their roots, the more it will strengthen their Jewish identity," said Rabbi Rabinovitz.

We must connect the Jewish youth of our generation to all of the previous generations of our people – we must let them experience the Kotel, he urged.

Eliav said that "only 20 per cent of Israeli soldiers had visited the Kotel as of six years ago. We asked ourselves how that could happen? Then we decided that we would start a project to bring them to the Kotel. Now most soldiers spend a full day in Jerusalem."

As the rabbi of the Kotel, Rabbi Rabinowitz receives thousands of letters from all over the world addressed to God. He is responsible for ensuring that they are inserted into the crevices between the large stones of the Kotel.

Twice a year, when the Kotel is overflowing with notes, they are taken to be buried on the Mount of Olives. "We pray that HaShem will hear all of the prayers," said Rabbi Rabinowitz.

"When King Solomon dedicated the Temple, the Bible says that he prayed that it would be a place where God would hear and answer the prayers of all people, not just the Jewish people."

Rabbi Rabinowitz's family has lived in Jerusalem for seven generations."My family purchased buildings in the old city of Jerusalem not far from the Kotel 100 years ago. In 1967… the Arabs had built a whole neighbourhood very near the Kotel on purpose – to hide it. Every time that we try to dig in the Old City, the Arabs oppose it because they know we will find more remnants of Jewish history and evidence [of] the Jewish people in Israel," he said.

Responding to a question about the political situafion in Israel, especially in light of the threat from Iran, Rabbi Rabinovitz said, "I am sure that Israel will overcome all enemies who want to hurt her. Through all of our struggles; we have overcome."

As for prospects for peace, he said, "There are some problems that I leave to the messiah… Judaism is willing to do a lot of thing for a real peace, but that looks impossible now. We made a decision to leave Gaza and we got Qassams."

As for demographic predictions that suggest Arabs will eventually become a majority in Jerusalem, Rabbi Rabinowitz said, "We must do everything to strengthen the Jewish majority of Jerusalem."

He added that the state has to do more to create jobs and promote economic growth in Jerusalem, as well as provide affordable housing for young couples.

Jewish Life

The olive and olive oil

By ALEX GROPPER

Past Forward

We Jews suffer culturally from a dual personality. Our ethos was formed in the desert, at Sinai, where we received the Decalogue, or the Ten Commandments, as they are better known. But our culture also belongs to the Mediterranean, where it has played an important role in the interactions along that marvellous, scenically breathtaking, inland sea, which has acted as a womb to such an important part of a nascent Western civilization.

It was the conflicts with two Mediterranean nations that helped to define our early history. The first was with Egypt, whose natural northern border is the Mediterranean. The other Mediterranean culture with whom we were engaged in a life and death struggle was that of the Philistines.

The Philistines were part of the enigmatic "Sea Peoples," whose origins are still obscure, although most scholars would put their origins somewhere in the Aegean and tied into the upheavals that convulsed the Mediterranean at the end of the Bronze Age, around 1200 BCE. These upheavals were part of the birth pains of a number of civilizations, including our own.

A major occurrence associated with the end of the Bronze Age was the Trojan War, which is seen as the mythic event that gave birth to the classical civilizations of both Greece and Rome, two other cultures that would have an important bearing on our own history.

Yet what is it that defines "Mediterranean"? Is there a commonality that allows us to link the disparate cultures mentioned above? According to Fernand Braudel, the eminent French historian who was a founder of the Annales School of historical thought, there is a common element that defines "Mediterranean." Braudel's definition is elegant in its simplicity. It has to do with a crop that is the essence of the Mediterranean diet – the olive.

Today, olive oil is considered part of a healthy diet and is widely used. Historically, the olive has played an important role in a number of cultures. When the Athenians received the olive as a gift from Athena, they immediately chose her as their city's patron deity. It was the olive's chief derivative, olive oil, which would play an important role in the rise of Athens as a major power in Greece.

Yet the largest olive oil industry in the ancient Mediterranean was not located in Greece. Rather, it was situated in the city of Ekron, along Israel's coastal plain, in seventh century BCE. This site has been the location of a major excavation for more than two decades.

The excavation's joint leaders are Trude Dothan of Jerusalem's Hebrew University and Sy Gittin of the Albright Archaeological Institute of the American Schools of Oriental Research in Jerusalem. Their work has revealed the importance of olive oil as a major commodity in the world's first free trade zone – the Assyrian Empire of seventh century BCE. It was the Assyrians who destroyed the northern kingdom of Israel, giving rise to the story of the 10 lost tribes, and who subjugated the southern kingdom of Judah.

It was while I was thinking of the importance of the olive for Mediterranean history and culture that I decided to organize a conference on olive oil in the Mediterranean, to be sponsored by the Canadian Institute for Mediterranean Studies, of which I am the president. The Institute is housed at St. Michael's College at the University of Toronto, which has given us tremendous support and encouragement for our various activities.

We hope to attract some top scholars in the field and are counting on the help of a number of Mediterranean consulates that supported our conference on the Sea Peoples last year. Once details have been formalized, I hope to invite readers to the conference. It promises to be a wonderful event and yet another example of the Past moving Forward into the future.

Resources for the deaf, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish
Highway

One of the areas in which the Internet excels is its ability to allow people with relatively specialized needs to exchange information and even forge virtual communities around the world. This is particularly true for people who are Jewish and deaf, and who may feel excluded or even alienated from the larger Jewish community. The Internet has some excellent resources for Jewish people who are deaf, their families and for the community at large to build bridges and get an understanding of the special challenges faced by the Jewish deaf community.

To get an understanding, read Hearing: Their Silent World, a two-part feature that appeared in Hamodia Magazine last year. In it, Rochel Issacson introduces us to Shimon and Frady Steinhouse, both of whom are deaf, and parents to children who can hear perfectly. Although she is living a very rewarding life, Frady says the community's lack of awareness of her needs affected a very special time in her life. While she was attending her children's graduations, something was missing. Frady explains that she "couldn't feel the nachas I should have felt" because sign language interpreters were not made available to her. [http://tinyurl.com/2e7cye]

Rochel Issacson then writes about her visit to Toronto's Yeshiva Nefesh Dovid, an international Jewish high school that caters to boys who are deaf or hard of hearing. Issacson describes the atmosphere in the classroom. "The students' hands cut through the air as they sign while learning Torah… their eyes alive with excitement. Says one boy, 'I used to go to a regular yeshiva, with 25 students in my class, and I frequently could not understand what the rabbi was saying. Here the classes are smaller, and the communication is much easier.'" [www.nefeshdovid.com/]

What are some of the halachic issues surrounding people who are deaf? Several years ago, Rabbi Mordechai Shuchatowitz, spiritual leader of Congregation Agudas Israel of Greenspring in Baltimore, wrote a paper called Halacha Concerning the Deaf and Hearing Impaired.

Some excerpts: "The use of hearing aids is permitted on Shabbat even though they are technically considered miniaturized, portable microphones, which are usually prohibited on the day of rest. But because hearing aids don't produce sound audible to the public, they're kosher."

Rabbi Shuchatowitz declares that "the deaf and hearing impaired can be counted on to complete a minyan." In explaining that God's presence rests amongst a group of 10 Jews and that the minyan results from a special closeness when 10 Jews daven, Rabbi Shuchatowitz argues that 'this special closeness is the result of God's relating to 10 Jewish souls, and does not depend on their hearing ability.'" Rabbi Shuchatowitz's four children all have either severe or profound hearing loss. [http://tinyurl.com/2hlaez]

What can congregations do to make themselves more accessible to the entire community? Our Way has several suggestions for creating a synagogue that is blind/deaf friendly. [http://tinyurl.com/286p27]

- Provide interpreters for services, rabbis' speeches and other community events.
- Designate specific seats for the deaf to make it easier for them to either see the interpreter or read the lips of the people leading the prayers and reading from the Torah.
- Encourage congregants to interact with deaf/blind or visually impaired worshippers. If you do not speak sign language and the deaf individual does not lip read, you can simply smile.

Sounds nice in theory. But what's it like to host three deaf boys for a Shabbat dinner? For someone who doesn't like "awkward silence," Richard Rabkin's Friday night meal was a learning experience. "As we completed our meal and the boys got up to leave, I wished them a 'good Shabbos.' But this time, they didn't have to read my lips – by then I knew how to say it in sign language. Over the course of the evening I learned a few words and was putting my newfound vocabulary to work. After a few moments I realized that I was having a direct conversation with my new friends, but doing it in silence. There was nothing awkward about this silence. This silence was golden." [http://tinyurl.com/22vxye]

Next week, more resources for deaf Jews.

Prutschi leaving Congress after 23 years

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Twenty-three years ago when Manuel Prutschi joined Canadian Jewish Congress' (CJC) Ontario office, the main threat facing the Jewish community came from neo-Nazis, white supremacists and Holocaust-deniers.

With many of of them either dead, in jail, deported or faded into obscurity, that threat has receded only to be replaced by perhaps an even more ominous one posed by radical Islamists.

As someone who's held a number of senior staff positions at Congress over the years, Prutschi has been at the forefront in confronting these enemies of the Jewish community. But on June 17, he will end his long association with Congress to take a job with a soon-to-be-launched charitable organization that, for now, remains anonymous.

While he won't reveal anything about the new organization, Prutschi said he does expect his role will be one that deals with policy issues.

In that respect, it should be a comfortable fit since his "central interests and concern [at Congress] has been policy. Any aspect of policy at one time or another went through me, either up front or behind the scenes," he said.

For much of his tenure at Congress, Prutschi served as national director of community relations, while for the past three years he has held the position of national executive vice-president.

His input generally focused on three areas: advocacy, defense and inter-group relations.

"I see my main contribution in that I played a role in enhancing the advocacy reputation of Congress." he said. "Congress rightly has the reputation as one of the top advocacy organizations in Canada."

Along with colleague Bernie Farber, Prutschi came on the scene as Ben Kayfetz was retiring. Together they "pursued two paths." One was "vocal, upfront and passionate about the issues." The other was to "approach issues with some judiciousness and [focus on] co-operation, not confrontation," Prutschi said.

As a result, "we acquired the reputation that when Congress speaks, it was listened to… We are the inheritors of Ben Kayfetz's work, his talmidim (students), really."

Manuel Prutschi

When Prutschi came to Congress' Ontario region after working in the organization's Manitoba office for three years, the Ernst Zundel and Jim Keegstra cases were gaining national notoriety. Soon they would be followed before the courts by other arch-rightists, including longtime Nazi sympathizer John Ross Taylor and New Brunswick teacher Malcolm Ross.

Although well known to those who track extremists, they were less familiar to prosecutors, and one of Prutschi's tasks was to provide them with background material about the racist movement.

In the late 1980s, the white supremacist Heritage Front arose, as did other racist groups that appealed to disaffected young people.

The Heritage Front, it was later revealed in a government study, even considered an attack on Congress' Bathurst Street headquarters.

Concerns over community security – already on the agenda because of terrorist attacks on synagogues in Paris and Istanbul – were heightened. In 1985 Congress published its first pamphlet highlighting security guidelines for community organizations. That was the beginning of a process of annual security meetings and the development of security protocols.

"The most nerve-wrenching time that I dealt with directly was during the first Gulf War (1991)," Prutschi said. "There was a tremendous amount of nervousness in the community… [Saddam] Hussein said he had activated agents around the world."

Following the World Trade Center attack and anthrax letters sent throughout the United States, protocols were distributed in how to receive mail, he added.

While community protection remains a key element in Congress' mandate, Prutschi's interest has turned to issues concerning discrimination.

An issue that will likely grow in importance in coming years is that of reasonable religious accommodation – how far a provider of services or an employer can be expected to go to meet the religious needs of an employee or customer.

Congress supported the Sikh community when it fought to have the Royal Canadian Mounted Police (RCMP) permit Sikh officers to wear turbans and it called on Legion Halls to do the same.

"In everything you have to strike a balance between individual rights and collective rights. I think a good approach is that the defence of your rights should not impinge on the rights of others, especially in a situation where you are serving the public," he said.

During his tenure at Congress, the organization increased its outreach to other religious and ethnic communities. Prutschi was actively involved in enhancing Jewish-Christian dialogue, in particular advocating that Protestant churches take a less critical attitude towards Israel. At times the United Church and the Anglican Church have each considered resolutions critical of Israel and Prutschi has worked with opponents of the resolutions within the churches to soften their public pronouncements.

In the early 1990s Congress took the step of designing missions to Israel for non-Jewish "influentials." Politicians, their assistants, religious groups and other ethnocultural groups were given the opportunity to witness first hand the issues facing the Jewish state.

Among the groups to take part in the trips were aboriginals, and he feels the Jewish community has created good relations with Canada's First Nations.

Looking back on his tenure, Prutschi said "there's no particular moment [that stands out], but it's the many people in the non-Jewish community that I've had the opportunity to work with."

Prosecutors in the Zundel and Keegstra cases "were very extraordinary individuals, beautiful examples of what it is to be Canadian," he said.

Colleagues at Congress are sad to see him go. Historian and former Congress president Irving Abella stated, "[it] will be a terrible loss for us and all those who care about racism and anti-Semitism in this country. Yours was always the voice of reasoned passion; you taught us much and you contributed enormously to the fight against the enemies of our community and our values. You will be profoundly missed."

David Shapiro, chair of the executive of Congress' Quebec region, said, "This is indeed a loss to the CJC and to the Canadian Jewish community… There are many who keenly recognize the contribution you have made over the years through your insight, dedication and skilful leadership, always imbued with a sense of purpose and mission and based on the fundamental values of the Torah and the Jewish people."

A MOVING EVENT: Downsview Park was transformed from a flat field into a playground for children of all ages and abilities on June 10 as the Zareinu Moveathon celebrated its 10th anniversary. BERMAN, LEBA

Canadian relatives regret to announce the passing of Leba Berman on February 12, 2007 at age 90 in Seattle, Washington. She was born in Mount Vernon, N.Y. to Harry and Miriam Fierst in 1916 but she had strong Canadian connections. She was the granddaughter of the late Rabbi Hirsch Cohen, Chief Rabbi of Montreal, and was married to Alfred Berman of Winnipeg, who passed away in 1965. She was dearly loved by her husband's sisters, the late Pearl Gringorten (children Lawrence, Barry and Reesa Gringorten, and Carla Baudot) and the late Anita Bliss (Benson) (sons Jeff and Aaron Benson).

Leba Berman lived a full and rewarding life as mother of five children, grandmother of six and great-grandmother of three. She earned her Master's degree in Social Work at age 45 and continued to work in the field of adoptions until 80 years of age. She was devoted to the Jewish people and culture, having traveled 16 times to Israel. She was a life-time member of Hadassah and instilled in her children and grandchildren a great love of Judaism.

She is survived by her four daughters: Linda Levy of Berkeley, California, and Susan Moon, Barbara Hayes and Bonnie Levine all of Seattle, Washington. She was predeceased by her son, Richard Berman, and her brothers, Herbert and Leonard Fierst of Maryland.

Leba delighted in her frequent trips to Toronto and Montreal to visit family and friends. We will greatly miss her passionate and bubbly spirit and her ever-ready laughter.

GILAD, Ruth - On Saturday, June 9, 2007 at Sunnybrook Health Sciences Centre. Ruth Gilad, beloved wife of the late Dov Gilad. Cherished mother and mother-in-law of Gila and Ricky Derin, Toby Indech of Scottsdale, AZ, and Jack Gilad and Douglas Hauer of Boston, MA. Loving daughter of Dorothy and the late Arie Goldfeld. Dear sister and sister-in-law of Sheba and Haim Grinhaus. Devoted grandmother of Ari, Dov, Cailey, and Amy. Lovingly remembered by cousin Jake Lisak, and Margarita. Dear aunt of Ayal and Lauren, and Aaron and Meryl. Services were held at Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel on Monday, June 11, 2007. Interment Community Section of Pardes Shalom Cemetery. If desired, memorial donations may be made to the Dov and Ruth Gilad Scholarship Fund in Life Sciences c/o Ben Gurion University of the Negev, 416-665-8054.

Study finds youth engage with Judaism in new ways

The kids are all right, Hillel head says

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The trend of Jewish youth venturing beyond traditional community institutions is here to stay, but it's nothing new and nothing to worry about, says the executive director of Hillel of Greater Toronto.

"It's not new, because in the 1960s, there was the Chavurah movement, which tried to break down the impersonal nature of the large congregations, regardless of their denominational affiliation," Zac Kaye said.

"What seems to happen is that each generation throws these things up and over time, they become more formalized. Things go through different stages. Some survive and some don't. It's not about worrying about it. It's about celebrating it. We shouldn't feel that we have to contain it. That would be the wrong thing to do."

Kaye spoke to The CJN about the future of the Jewish community in North America shortly after the release of a study by the Andrea and Charles Bronfman Philanthropies titled The Continuity of Discontinuity. Released a year after Hillel International conducted its own survey of the "millennial generation," it looked at the alternative ways in which young people are connecting with Judaism.

"Continuity may depend on discontinuity. In fact, change is a constant of Jewish history. Jewish life has always changed because that's what living things do – they adapt to their surroundings without abandoning what makes them unique," stated the report, which was written by historian Ari Kelman and sociologist Steven M. Cohen.

The study highlighted four organizations that it said have broken free of the Jewish institutional mould to engage a younger generation of Jews.

- Ikar, "a Jewish spiritual community that stands at the intersection of spirituality and social justice," was founded by Rabbi Sharon Brous and is described as a "community of Jews" rather than a congregation or synagogue.
- Storahtelling is a non-profit music and dramatic company that fuses storytelling, the Torah and theatre as an answer to boring sermons.
- JDub records is a non-profit Jewish record label that produces music by Jewish artists that goes beyond Klezmer music in an attempt to strengthen the bond between Jews.
- Salon, which originated in Toronto and was created by Canadian journalist Mireille Silcoff, is a discussion group in which young professionals talk about Jewish issues.

"What is exciting about the study is that they are looking at four organizations that have really created a whole way of celebrating being Jewish in so many different ways. It is something to be excited about," Kaye said.

"It's not about one entry point. There is not just one path or one door. Who knows where they lead, and it doesn't matter which path you take, as long as you're taking a path."

The study suggests Jewish youth are thirsting for diverse ways to engage seriously in Jewish life. They're interested in having access to synagogues and Jewish community centres as well as alternative publications, concerts and salons.

"This is a generation of limitless choices. They're making choices, but they're not making the same traditional Jewish choices and accepting the same package deal that their parents did. They don't have to, because they are marrying later," said Tilly Shames, associate director at Hillel of Greater Toronto.

The study found that synagogues and other institutions tend to attract married people with children, and as a result, their membership is generally older than the younger adults who are initiating the aforementioned projects, making established institutions culturally unappealing for Jews under 35.

"Whether it is through social justice, or whether it is through culture, the holidays, or Holocaust remembrance and genocide awareness, it is just them doing Jewish on their terms and not on the terms of their parents," Shames said.

Shames noted that the Hillel International Millennial Study described contemporary Jewish youth as "universally human and distinctively Jewish."

"That sends a very strong message about this generation. It is a matter of recognizing that the values we have are values that cross cultural borders, that connect us with others on a universal level."

Kaye said the Bronfman study helps promote the message that it's important for Jewish professionals to embrace rather than criticize the choices of Jewish youth.

He added that the authors of the study made a mistake by including a derogatory comment by Silcoff, who said she wanted to create an experience that is not tied to "suburban Thornhill Yerushalayim architecture synagogue" or to "the infantilizing [Jewish] community centre."

He said Jews should celebrate all forms of Jewish expression.

"If you're Orthodox and that, for you, is the way, that's great. If you're outside of that, and that's not for you, that's also fine… There is nothing to be gained by diminishing someone else's experience. It's not about that," he said.

"There are a couple thousand people in Thornhill who have chosen that way of life. That should be applauded and respected just as much as what she's doing with the Salon," Kaye said.

VOLUNTEERS HONOURED

The Friendship Circle, which links children with special needs to teenage mentors, hosted its fifth volunteer recognition dinner. Some 130 teenagers were recognized for their loyalty and devotion at the June 6 event. Pictured, from left, are Shoshana Ouzzan and her volunteer Kiki Halperin, Friendship Circle co-ordinator Chaya Perman, and Thornhill MPP Mario Racco, who gave out the awards.

Liberals denounce Conservative promise

Josh Cooper, executive director of the Canadian Jewish Political Action Committee (CJPAC), a community organization that seeks to engage Jews in the political process, said he, too, is encouraged by the PC announcement and is hoping to stoke more public participation on the issue.

In an e-mail sent out to its members, CJPAC called the PC announcement "a political moment for our community that comes once in a generation."

The e-mail exhorted readers to send a letter each to Ontario PC leader John Tory and to Premier Dalton McGuinty – the first to congratulate Tory on his education platform and the other to urge McGuinty and the governing Liberals to adopt a similar funding policy.

Though still short on fine details, the PC pledge to publicly fund faith-based schools focuses on three "strict criteria and accountability requirements," as outlined in the party's new policy document.

The first deals with incorporating the requirements of Ontario's common curriculum into faith-based schools.

The second would require them to participate in standardized testing programs.

Lastly, proper teacher "credentialing" would need to be addressed.

The Liberals were quick to denounce the Tory promise, issuing a statement that called it "a step backward" and saying it was "their latest scheme to take money out of public education to support private schools."

"I think there are a lot of questions," she told The CJN last week. "I don't think it's clear at all how faith-based, private school boards would be incorporated into the public system or what kind of allowance would be made for extra tuition to be paid on top of funding from a government that [Tory] was leading."

Wynne added that even though the Conservative policy would require teachers to have appropriate credentials, "Tory doesn't specifically say 'accredited Ontario teachers.'"

The Liberals say 53,000 students are currently enrolled in private, faith-based schools, and they estimate the cost of public school tuition at $9,432 per student, based on Ministry of Education figures, putting the cost of funding faith-based students at $500 million annually.

"[Under the PC plan], if you play out the logic, basically it's $800 million [in new funding for education], of which $500 million could go to 53,000 kids and $300 million to two million kids," said Ben Chin, a senior media advisor for the Liberals.

> 'Should the public system be funding separate schools within its own board? That's a fundamental question about what kind of society we want to build.'

Chin also questioned the rationale behind the Conservative platform.

"Do we want to build a society where children play in cultural or religious enclaves?" he asked. "Should the public system be funding separate schools within its own board? That's a fundamental question about what kind of society we want to build."

Steven Shulman, director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, said concerns about faith-based schools draining money from the existing public system are unfounded.

"The parents [currently] sending their kids to faith-based schools are taxpayers," he said. "So they're already helping to fund the system. In this policy, the Tories have said they're going to put more money into the education system. So it's not a zero-sum game."

Shulman added that the CJC isn't seeking to make this policy a "wedge issue," preferring instead to work with all parties on the matter.

He noted that "there are many Liberals in caucus who feel that… the concept of bringing faith-based schools into public education is a good thing."

Speaking to The CJN last week, Conservative MPP Frank Klees, the opposition education critic, said that fine-tuning the policy would "have to be worked out through the consultation period. But the essence here is that we are committed to bringing fairness to education funding… to end the discrimination that is currently very obvious in this province, that the Catholic schools are being funded to the exclusion of all other faiths. That has been the request of the faith-based communities. It has certainly been the request of the Jewish community "

Bringing faith-based schools into the public system would bring them more in line with the status now enjoyed by Ontario's Roman Catholic schools.

The Liberal government has maintained that it's constitutionally obligated to fund Catholic schools. It argues that the 1867 Constitution, which sought to protect existing rights for denominational schools of the time, requires Ontario to maintain a publicly funded Catholic system.

"Our position remains the same," Wynne affirmed.

In 1999, the United Nations Human Rights Committee (UNHRC) ruled that this funding is discriminatory, violating Canada's obligations under the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, saying the need to protect Roman Catholic funding is now out of step with modern times.

The Multi-Faith Coalition's new advocacy literature takes the UNHRC argument one step further, suggesting that, "the rationale for protecting the Catholic minority in 1867 is now applicable to Ontario's current day minorities."

'It rights a wrong in Canadian society'

"We very much welcome this policy announcement [and] the financial relief this promises to our committed body of parents. It rights a wrong in Canadian society, and we hope other political parties will realize the basic fairness of this stance by the PCs and will follow suit."

Paul Shaviv

Shaviv added that there is plenty of space at CHAT's new Vaughan campus to handle any upswing in enrolment.

The Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools (OAJDS), whose members attended the Conservative policy conference this month where the education announcement was made, were similarly excited at the news.

"To have a major political party put this in their platform is something we endorse and applaud," said Stuart Lewis, OAJDS' executive director.

Lewis, who is also president of Netivot Hatorah Day School, played down the possibility of higher enrolments.

Lewis said he doesn't "expect a large movement of children from [public] schools into Jewish day schools," in the short term.

"Historically, when we've looked at this situation around Canada and the world, there hasn't been a tremendous movement like that."

Still, he said it's imperative for the Jewish public to understand the importance of this announcement and the role it could play in ensuring the future vitality of the community.

"We have about 34 per cent of Jewish families with children in [Jewish] day schools," Lewis said. "We need to make sure those families are aware of the policy and that the 66 per cent of families who don't have children in [Jewish] day schools… will see a better business case to bring their children into the Jewish educational sphere."

The Tory pledge to fund faith-based schools has raised many unanswered questions about the three criteria the party has set as conditions for receiving public funds: fulfilling the requirements of Ontario's common curriculum, participation in standardized testing, and what the PC policy platform calls proper teacher "credentialing."

"There's a whole host of issues… about unions, [and] what if the cost per student exceeds what [a Tory government would be] willing to pay us? Who owns the buildings? All that still has to be ironed out," said Joseph Adler, a Toronto lawyer and parent of children in Jewish day schools who has been part of the advocacy effort around public funding.

Adler hailed the education pledge as a "huge and monumental shift in policy" because it comes from the "possible next premier," and he applauded it as "a watered-down version, I believe, of what they could have come out with."

For instance, he said, "When they talk about accreditation, that's different than certification. With certification, you're talking about [needing to be] a graduate of teacher's college. But accreditation, you're talking about some kind of equivalency. I think there's more latitude there for a teacher who's been teaching for 30 years without any credentials."

Calls to a number of day schools for comment were not returned by The CJN's deadline.

MediaCentral combats bias about Israel

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The director of Israel's MediaCentral recently spoke to Toronto journalists and community members about his country's latest hasbarah (public relations) endeavour to combat media misconceptions and bias about the Holy Land.

Aryeh Green, director of the six-month-old Jerusalem-based journalistic support centre for foreign reporters, addressed the small audience at the offices of lawyer and Israel historian Jacques Gauthier.

Green, a strategic communications specialist who for almost a decade was senior adviser on anti-Semitism and democracy to Natan Sharansky in his capacities as a member of the Knesset and deputy prime minister of Israel, called MediaCentral a "crucial" development for Israeli hasbarah.

Aryeh Green

"It's not enough to complain about inaccurate reporting about Israel," Green said emphatically. "We want to help reporters get the stories right in the first place."

He added that Palestinian outreach to journalists is more advanced than Israel's in that, according to his information, there are no less than 12 Palestinian organizations dedicated to hosting foreign journalists and providing them with "the Palestinian narrative" about the history and current events in the Holy Land.

"Palestinians have been world leaders [in embracing] the journalistic community when they come to the territories," he said.

Green was approached in 2005 to head MediaCentral by HonestReporting.com, a U.S.-based non-profit dedicated to providing fair and accurate coverage of the Middle East. He admitted he was initially uninterested in the project, citing his skepticism of being able to change the attitude of the foreign press toward Israel.

"But then I understood that [the foreign press] in Israel do need and want help… If that help is timely and effective, they don't care where it comes from," he said.

MediaCentral has three goals, he said. The first is to be a service-oriented organization for foreign journalists. "If someone needs an interpreter, a chauffeur, background information, a tour guide… we have staff that will provide it through our prism."

Secondly, MediaCentral is a physical location where journalists can "schmooze" with their colleagues as well as with politicians and people of interest who regularly make the rounds of MediaCentral's space. "It's a chance to get to know people informally and build relationships," Green said.

Lastly, other than being pro-Israel, MediaCentral does not have an agenda to push except as encompassed in the following slogan, "Accuracy is Israel's best ally," he said.

MediaCentral's brochure lists the agencies that have used their services so far, including the Toronto Star, Al Jazeera, Time magazine and the Wall Street Journal, among others.

Green said he believes the more journalists get to know Israel, the easier it will be for them to change their language and outlook on the state. "It doesn't matter if it's scrutiny of [Israel's president in absentia] Moshe Katsav or anything else," he said. "Warts and all, the more a journalist gets to know Israel, the more they can write fairly about it."

Using an example of how he hopes MediaCentral can effect change, Green said the organization leads groups of journalists to different points on Israel's security barrier, showing them that their use of the term "apartheid wall" or "wall" is erroneous. In fact, Green tells them, 97 per cent of it is a chain-link fence that could be taken down in a matter of months when peace is achieved.

"When you show them the fence, they understand the power of [Israel's] argument. Journalists don't get this kind of exposure and explanation," Green said. "The vast majority of journalists are not anti-Semitic or anti-Israel… but they do come with baggage of the acceptance of the Palestinian narrative. I'm focused on opening [journalists] up to the complexities of Israel's issues."

Green said MediaCentral has also taken five field trips to Sderot to show journalists the Israeli side of the issue. He said many "second tier" reporters, journalists from outfits less well-known and less well-funded than those of "first tier" news agencies such as CNN and the BBC, don't often get to this area because it's too hard for them to access without help, the sort of help MediaCentral now provides.

When asked how effective the organization has been, Green told The CJN it was difficult to measure, but anecdotally, he has heard from numerous reporters thanking him for MediaCentral's help. He also cited results of a survey he conducted in which 93 per cent of journalist-respondents agreed that MediaCentral helped them report Israeli "issues accurately and fairly."

With an operating budget of just under $1 million, provided by UJA Federation of New York's Solelim Fund and by donations from various foundations and individuals, MediaCentral continues to expand its operations and hire new staff.

Green said he recently hired a Palestinian Arab east Jerusalem woman as the media services representative for MediaCentral.

"She acknowledges Israel and its right to statehood," he said. "There are many Palestinians, more than we hear about, who want a peaceful resolution."

MediaCentral hopes to expand its presence in Israel by opening a branch in Tel Aviv and a future office at the American Colony Hotel in Jerusalem.

Former rocker now a biblical scholar

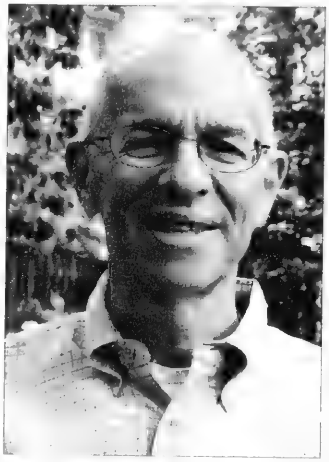
Incoming JTS provost played at Woodstock with Sha Na Na

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

The incoming provost of the Jewish Theological Seminary may be indulging in understatement when he says, "The lifestyle of the itinerant rock and roll musician was not me."

But Alan Cooper's life could have easily taken an alternate route. From 1969 to 1971, as an undergraduate student at Columbia University, he sang bass as one of the original members of the rock/doo-wop group Sha Na Na, performing on the final day of the Woodstock Festival in the summer of 1969, just before Jimi Hendrix, as well as on Rock and Roll is Here to Stay, Sha Na Na's first record.

Cooper, a 56-year old PHD in religious studies with close-cropped receding grey hair and a dry sense of humour, missed the travelling, camaraderie and performing after leaving the group, but he wanted to get on with his life, he said in a recent interview at the Toronto home of a friend.



Alan Cooper

He went on to graduate studies at Yale University, focusing on the linguistic structure of biblical poetry for his dissertation, and taught religious studies at McMaster University for 10 years before returning to the United States in the mid-1980s with his wife and two children, now in their early 20s. In 1979, he spent a year in Israel as a postdoctoral fellow at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

Cooper, who will continue to teach one course per semester after succeeding Jack Wertheimer as provost, was in Toronto June 7 to speak on behalf of JTS' Canadian Student Bursary Fund, which currently supports 27 Canadian students in the seminary's rabbinical, cantorial, undergraduate and educational programs.

These days, it's JTS – the New York flagship institution of the Conservative movement – that excites the incoming chief academic officer, and he was hoping to transmit some of that feeling in his talk later that day. He frequently leaned forward, elbows resting on his knees, and his face animated, as he discussed some of the changes taking place at the institution.

As of July 1, Cooper will be one of three new administrators at the school, along with Arnold Eisen, incoming chancellor, and Rabbi Daniel Nevins, incoming dean of the rabbinical school. A professor of Jewish studies and chair of the biblical department of JTS who has been with the school for 10 years, Cooper is also a professor of Bible at the Union Theological Seminary, a nearby non-denominational Christian seminary.

He described Nevins as "bright, exciting and filled with energy and ideas," and Eisen as "an invigorating force" and "a serious thinker about the nature of the Jewish community in North America today" who is interested in "getting the seminary out into the community," in part through a planned public education program.

This year marks another significant change at JTS. Following the acceptance last December by the movement's committee on Jewish law and standards of a rabbinic responsum allowing the ordination of gays and lesbians, JTS announced in March that it will admit openly gay and lesbian students to its rabbinical and cantorial schools for the first time.

Cooper, who has been affiliated with the Conservative movement his entire adult life, describes himself as being from "the more liberal side of the spectrum." He grew up in New York in "a Modern Orthodox community of a sort that doesn't exist any more," attending a synagogue that was "completely traditional" aside from its mixed seating.

Comments from more traditional elements in the Conservative movement, who oppose the seminary's decision and wonder whether there is still a place for them, sadden him.

"The intent of the decision was to be more inclusive, not to exclude, and that reaction suggests otherwise," Cooper explained. "It suggests a certain self-exclusion... Even if you look at surveys in the United States, you're still talking about only a 2 to 1 majority in favour of admission, which means that one third of our members were uncomfortable with the decision. It's important to engage in a program of reconciliation.

"Our intention was to provide opportunities for really valuable individuals who want to provide service to the Jewish community."

He noted that the seminary's policy of excluding gay and lesbian students has cost them straight students who felt "uncomfortable with the fact we were being exclusionary."

The issue is not a new one to Cooper, who taught Bible and served as director of the school of graduate studies at the Reform movement's Hebrew Union College in Cincinnati when it was struggling with the same issues. "You would think there would be less resistance in the Reform movement, but you would be wrong for all sorts of reasons ranging from social prejudice to whatever else motivates people," he said.

He likened the issue to others like the role of women, which "percolate up" from general society. In the Orthodox world, he noted, as more women become educated, the movement is struggling with the issue of how to "authenticate" them.

"What matters more from a halachic point of view is not whether we will change with the times, but how and how rapidly. The pace of change is crucial… It's certainly our new chancellor's goal to bring about this change in a way that does not marginalize and exclude.

After the interview Cooper planned to pay one last visit to Sam the Record Man's downtown Toronto outlet before its June 30 closing, a frequent hangout of his when he lived in Hamilton, but he ended up spending time with his Toronto host, listening to his extensive record collection, instead. A longtime collector of classical recordings, Cooper now favours Bach and Beethoven.

Had he remained in Sha Na Na, Cooper might have ended up as a generous donor to JTS rather than on its faculty, he mused.

But, as he noted himself, "how many professors can say they performed at the Woodstock Festival?"

Shaarei Shomayim's rabbi heading to St. Louis

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Moshe Shulman will leave Toronto early this summer after almost 10 years as spiritual leader of Shaarei Shomayim Congregation.

The 42-year-old rabbi and his wife Baila, who has taught classes at the synagogue and provided personal counselling and home hospitality during their time in Toronto, will be honoured by friends at a tribute dinner at Shaarei Shomayim on June 25. He will leave the synagogue in early July, and the Shulman family will head to Missouri, where the rabbi will assume the pulpit at Young Israel of St. Louis.

"While it's a somewhat smaller congregation, it's the leading Orthodox congregation in St. Louis and plays a significant role in the midwest community. It's the largest leading modern Orthodox synagogue in the area," Rabbi Shulman said of the 160-member shul.

He added that he felt the move would be an opportunity to get involved in the American rabbinate on a more global scale. "In a shul like Shaarei Shomayim, [those] opportunities are much more limited because of the [large] size of the congregation."

In an interview in his Shaarei Shomayim study, Rabbi Shulman, who grew up in New York and Los Angeles, reflected on his time in Toronto and on some of the issues facing modern Orthodoxy and the broader Jewish community.

For starters, he laments the use of "the labels and the boxes" that he feels divide the Jewish people.

"My philosophy in life has been to bridge some of the worlds as best I can," he said.

Rabbi Moshe Shulman

At the height of the intifadah in 2001, Rabbi Shulman – who lived for 10 years in Israel – joined Conservative and Reform colleagues rabbis Baruch Frydman-Kohl and John Moscowitz to spearhead the Israel Now Consortium, along with the leadership of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, at a time when it had already become uncommon for Orthodox pulpit rabbis to share a public platform with their non-Orthodox counterparts.

"We may practise our Judaism differently, we may have different beliefs in ideological issues, but that doesn't mean we can't find common ground where it exists and work together," said Rabbi Shulman, who was ordained in 1992 after studying to become a rabbi, mohel and teacher at Yeshivat Sha'alvim in Israel. He has also done coursework toward a master's degree in education, and has a B.Sc. in computer software engineering.

"It's a balance. You walk a tightrope because you want to maintain that relationship and at the same time maintain your standards and ideological beliefs and your position as who you are, as an Orthodox rabbi. But I think that's true of modern Orthodoxy, or engaged Orthodoxy, in general… On every level it's a balancing act, but I think it's a worthwhile effort."

Within the Orthodox community, too, it's no secret there are divisions between modern Orthodox and haredi factions, but Rabbi Shulman said he prefers to focus on constructive ways of addressing the issues. A member of Toronto's Va'ad Harabonim, Rabbi Shulman said he enjoys a "warm and positive relationship with the Orthodox rabbinate.

"I have an open dialogue with all the rabbinic leaders in the city." He cited haredi leader Rabbi Shlomo Miller in particular as someone he has spoken to "with a great deal of mutual respect."

However, he said, he finds the "lack of dialogue and the intolerance" among both modern Orthodox and right-wing Orthodox communities toward each other "disturbing."

As far as he can remember, he has never given a sermon or spoken publicly to criticize the right-wing Orthodox world or the ideologies of Conservative or Reform Judaism, he said.

"There's enough to unite us, to mandate that we work together. We don't need to define who we are by saying, 'We're not them.' I think all that does is create a sense of self-satisfaction."

He added that there have been "issues in the community I haven't been happy with, and we have dealt with them on a quiet, behind-the-scenes basis."

A decision about three years ago to raise the mechitzah in Shaarei Shomayim's sanctuary was an initiative of the shul's board, implemented with the rabbi's support. From his perspective, he said, the change "was never presented as an accommodation to the community."

Instead, he sees it as a "strengthening" of the synagogue's halachic position, and he noted that the congregation's previous building on St. Clair Avenue West, from which it moved in the 1960s, had no mechitzah at all, other than an aisle dividing the men's and women's sections.

"I came in with a mandate to elevate the level of learning and spiritual and intellectual depth," he said.

He introduced a number of new programs, including a daily 6:15 a.m. Gemarah class that he said was instrumental in revitalizing the synagogue's morning minyan.

"I'm a strong proponent of the notion that spiritual growth comes from engaging the mind in Jewish life."

He credits his parents, Rabbi Nisson and Rywka Shulman, for much of his ideological outlook. "Our family spans the spectrum from far right wing to non-religious. I've seen the way my parents integrate with all aspects of the community."

Liberal task force to study security fund

Thornhill MP Susan Kadis to chair committee

Liberal leader Stephane Dion last week announced creation of a caucus task force to examine the nuts and bolts of a proposed security fund that would protect minority communities should the Liberals form a government.

The eight-person task force will visit community organizations in Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver, Winnipeg and Halifax to study the risks faced by "ethnic, cultural and religious groups" as potential targets of terrorism or hate crimes.

"A Liberal government would work quickly to establish a fund that would help at-risk communities to cover the costs of security in their places of worship and gathering places," said Dion. "In many instances, significant festivals and functions, whether at a gurdwara (a Sikh temple), mosque, church, synagogue, community centre or religious school now require additional security measures to function safely."

The task force will be chaired by Toronto-area MP Susan Kadis. Senator Mobina Jaffer will serve as co-chair.

Jewish community groups have been lobbying federal and provincial governments for years for financial aid to offset the cost of security measures at Jewish facilities. Security has been an issue within the community since threats from racist groups surfaced in the mid-1980s. In recent years, concerns have expanded to include the dangers posed by groups linked to the Middle East.

Dion's office released a letter to Kadis and Jaffer outlining the task force's mandate and tracing its genesis to a speech the leader gave to the Mississauga Crime Prevention Association in March 2007.

"We believe that any community organization or institution that is a likely target of terror or hate crime and is willing to work constructively with law enforcement officials to safeguard their members, deserves the help of the federal government," the letter stated. "The concept of a pool of funds specifically set aside for this purpose was one the previous Liberal government had begun to explore."

The task force is being asked to:

- determine objective criteria that will evaluate whether a group faces risk;
- assess the willingness of the cultural organization to work with law enforcement officials;
- determine reasonable expenses and whether the government should match community input, subject to a cap;
- examine whether the funds should be ongoing or for one-time infrastructure upgrades;
- consider whether the funds should be retroactive.

The letter asks Kadis and Jaffer to prepare an interim report by early August 2007, prior to the Liberals' national caucus, which runs from Aug. 28 to 30.

New Israeli glass studio sparkles

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

It's been three months since Orly and Giora Meyer decided to open shop to showcase their family's 40-year-old glass art and decor business in Toronto.

AM Studio, located in the Castlefield design and decor district, features pieces by six Israeli artists, from glass serving ware to sinks.

"It's quite a unique product and quite contemporary," Orly said. "People find it artistic on one hand and also functional."

Giora's father, Andreas Meyer, opened the original Andreas Meyer Studio in Nahariya, Israel in 1967. It has since moved to Tefen Industrial Park, an artistic district in Western Galilee.

Toronto's AM Studio features Andreas' work along with the work of five other artists including his son, Yigael Meyer, and his wife Vared. Valery Rotenberg also works with fused glass, which is a unique process during which three layers of glass are fused together in the kiln. The combination of one coloured and two clear layers of glass create a different look, Orly said.

Shimon (Shimele) Peleg makes the unique glass sinks, and invented a unique glass technique that gives each piece an unusual texture and an earthy look, regardless of colour.

"We took the crème de la crème of what we produced [in Israel] and brought it here. My father started with souvenirs. I took it more into design and into art," Giora said.

He said that what makes Israeli artists different is their uncanny ability not to balk in the face of obstacles.

"It's a combination of the high self-confidence of Israelis and chutzpah of doing whatever they think is right – designers, they dare," he said.

"Israel is very strong with design. We just need a little bit more investment and Israel can be like Italy," Orly added.

Since Orly and Giora moved to Thornhill from Israel in 2003 with their three children, they have been working from home and touring hundreds of galleries and gift shows across North America.

"We left the gift shows because we don't want to make gifts, we want to design things," Giora said.

"We felt that with gifts, you can travel and sell or market it. With this kind of stuff, you have to show it... We are very happy with the move and with what we did, and I think the outcome is beautiful. We are getting wonderful reactions," he said.

Giora said they began designing themselves because it can be hard to work closely with and customize a Canadian client's piece when it needs to be shipped back and forth from Israel.

"We decided we would make it here and we would support the local custom market, and there is a market for that," Giora said.

The Meyers are excited because their store is not just a showroom, but a studio as well.

"This is selling," Orly said, gesturing towards the spacious showroom. "This is creating," she said smiling, indicating the uncluttered workroom.

"We came from creation... It's always about design, it's always about creating – this is our heart."

So far only Giora works with glass, but Orly, whose background is in architecture and interior design, would love to be involved one day.

The Meyers' future plans include helping Israeli artists get more recognition, to give Israel the reputation they feel it deserves.

"Our plans are big and they are on both sides of the ocean," said Orly.

AM Studios is having an official opening on June 27th. The gallery is located at 121 Miranda Avenue at Castlefield and Dufferin avenues. More information can be found at www.amstudio.ca or by calling the studio at 416-783-4100.

Those against the change felt it was anti-democratic, while those in favour felt it streamlined the CJC’s governing structure to allow it to more effectively respond to new challenges and a new advocacy environment.

In an acknowledgement of some of the harsh feelings that the debate on the bylaw elicited, outgoing president Ed Morgan urged members to look to the future and to embrace the new organizational structure.

Ed Morgan

“Let’s stop fighting internal battles as if governance is an end in itself,” he said. “We are an advocacy organization… redemption lies in intelligently analyzing and acting on whatever injustices are out there.”

There are still plenty of “external” evils to fight here in Canada, Morgan said, alluding to a presentation earlier in the day to the plenary by Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker.

In his address to the several hundred members and observers, Baker said that the Canadian media have an anti-Israel bias.

Alan Baker

“A week ago we marked the 40th anniversary of the Six Day War. What did we see in the Canadian media? A series of hateful articles about the continuing suffering of the Palestinians for 40 years, all because of Israel. . very slanted, very manipulative articles by people who know it is not the truth,” he said.

Baker added that “the embassy of Israel in Ottawa is not accepted in the regional grouping of embassies [due to pressure from the Arab countries]… Israel is blocked from any representation in the diplomatic corps in Ottawa. This should not happen anywhere, especially not in the capital of Canada.”

For young leadership, the Brian A. Finestone Memorial Award was presented to Steven Farber, while Tami Michaelson King was the recipient of the Monroe and Minnie Abbey Award.

Farber – who is originally from Ottawa and is the son of Barbara Farber, president of UIA Federations Canada – has been active in the Toronto Jewish community for the 10 years he has lived there and has received a number of awards, including the UJA Leadership Development Award.

Michaelson King, an officer at large of CJC, Pacific region, lives in Port Moody, B.C. She is very involved in human rights issues and serves on the March of the Living committee.

Cpl. Tamar Freeman of Toronto is a Canadian Forces medic who recently returned to Canada from a tour of duty in Afghanistan. She was presented with the Alan Rose Award for International Human Dignity.

The Samuel Bronfman medal was presented to Rose Wolfe for dedicating her life to achieving social justice through volunteerism. A chancellor emerita of the University of Toronto, Wolfe was the first female president of Toronto Jewish Congress and has held numerous other positions in Jewish and other organizations.

Ottawa human rights lawyer Richard Warman, who is not Jewish, has, over the past five years, dedicated his time and risked his personal security and safety to fighting Internet hate. During that time, he has been the successful complainant in 10 cases involving Internet hate. He was awarded the Saul Hayes Human Rights Award for his efforts.

Environment Minister John Baird was among the politicians and dignitaries at the plenary. He was introduced by former CJC president Moshe Ronen as one “who stands out as one of our most cherished friends on [Parliament] Hill – ever!”

Baird said that “Israel can count on the government of Canada continuing to stand behind Israel.”

He also promised to convey the CJC’s request for security funding to the government caucus.

“That message has been heard and we are taking it back to our colleagues… and on the revocation of Canadian citizenship, we have a responsibility to send a message around the world that if you commit heinous crimes against humanity, you can run but you cannot hide… we will find you no matter how long it takes.”

Local politicians, as well as representatives from the embassies of Poland, Yemen, Germany, Turkey, Morocco, Jordan, the United States, Azerbaijan and the Vatican, also attended the plenary.

Other executive members of CJC acclaimed for the next two years are vice-president Jack Mintz, secretary-treasurer Elizabeth Wolfe and honorary legal counsel, Calvin Goldman.

The new board members of Congress for the coming term include past president Ed Morgan, Pacific region chair Gerry Cuttler, Quebec region chair Victor Goldbloom, CJC Ontario region chair Frank Bialystok, Brent Belzberg, Judy Kremer, Joel Reitman, Debbie Kimel, Saul Koschitzky, Philip Berger, Berl Nadler, James Scharfstein, Howard Morry, Joseph Gabay, Ben Zarnett, Hershel Sahian, Harold Brief, Igor Korenzvit, Paul Brown, Ron Prehogan, Nora Gold, Joel Richler, Mark Freiman, Michael Grand, Rabbi Reuben Poupko, Armand Kessous, Adam Atlas, Sue Carol Isaacson, A. Mark David, Abby Morris, Gerald Gall, Ted Zacks, Bob Willmot and Steven Farber.

Dumont's meeting with Jews not a story, official says

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A top official at Federation CJA says he's puzzled as to why the French-language daily newspaper La Presse ran a front-page story about a meeting between Mario Dumont and prominent Jews that occurred on the eve of the provincial budget vote.

"We're not quite sure why this is a story," Bram Freedman, the federation's chief operating officer and director of external relations, said of last Thursday's article about the meeting with the Action démocratique du Québec (ADQ) leader. "Jewish Quebecers, like all Quebecers, have the right to meet with their political representatives."

Headlined, "Mario Dumont is courted by the Jewish community," the piece described a two-hour-long evening meeting on May 31 between "about a dozen" of the Jewish community's "most influential leaders" and Dumont at the Westmount home of retired Senator Leo Kolber, a storied figure for his past fundraising on behalf of the Quebec and federal Liberal parties.

It was Kolber, La Presse reported, who invited Dumont to his home. However, the only other Jewish attendee identified in the story was Steven Cummings, a former president of Federation CJA (the story erroneously refers to federation as the "Canadian Jewish Alliance").

Because of its high-profile, above-the-fold placement and language, the article also seemed to reinforce notions that the Jewish community is wealthy and powerful. The second paragraph, for example, described Kolber as "richissime" (fabulously rich), and the Jewish community as "puissante," or powerful.

Dumont said later the meeting was not a secret and some reporters were aware of it.

Freedman said the organized Jewish community would react officially if it felt public reaction to the story makes it necessary.

"We will be monitoring talk shows, and we will follow up if follow-up is needed," he said. He stressed that the "meeting did not involve the organized Jewish community."

The substance of the article, though, did not appear to be particularly revelatory.

It suggested that the Jewish community has grown increasingly disenchanted with the Liberal Party under Jean Charest for taking the community's support for granted. It said it would no longer "put all its eggs into one basket" and would consider allying itself with another party under the right conditions.

The article made specific references to the bid in 2005 by Charest – later withdrawn after media-fuelled public outcry – to increase government funding to Jewish day schools, and it cited Jewish community disappointment at D'Arcy McGee MNA Lawrence Bergman losing his post as revenue minister in a cabinet shuffle after the recent provincial election.

The story further quoted unnamed "Liberal sources" as saying that during the meeting, Dumont was given "assurances" that the Jewish community would provide an "important level" of financial support for the ADQ in exchange for the Jewish General Hospital (JGH) being recognized as a "university hospital." (This also appears to be erroneous, since the JGH has long been affiliated with McGill University.)

Dumont said in the La Presse story that the hospital's status was discussed, but the issue of financial support of the ADQ was never broached.

Steven Slimovitch, legal counsel for B'nai Brith League for Human Rights, said that while there are "negative connotations" linked to perceptions of how ethnic communities engage in political financing, "everyone does it."

Aside from broad suggestions and the use of unnamed sources, however, the article didn't appear to offer any real evidence that Montreal Jews were about to abandon the Liberals in any significant numbers.

Victor Goldbloom, a former Liberal cabinet member who is now president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, reportedly said it is "normal practice" for the Jewish community to meet with political leaders. And Jack Jedwab, CJC's former director, was quoted as saying that the Jewish community has not forgotten Dumont siding with the "Yes" side before the 1995 referendum vote.

The following day, in an editorial cartoon in La Presse, Dumont was portrayed in chassidic garb, saying that next week he expected to be courted by the "nude cyclists" in the Plateau, a reference to a recent protest that actually took place against the overuse of gas-powered vehicles.

Charest for his part, accused Dumont of misleading Quebecers by being absent during crucial budget negotiations in Quebec City. The budget passed June 1.

Slimovitch said that in substance, the La Presse article accurately portrayed the fact the Jewish community "can go elsewhere" other than the Liberals if it decides to.

"As long as they can go to a non-separatist party," Jewish Quebecers will be satisfied, Slimovitch said.

Slimovitch declined to comment "one way or the other" on whether he felt the story's front-page placement reinforced a certain perception of the Jewish community.

A call to Philippe Cantin, La Presse's associate editor, was not returned by The CJN's deadline.

Trial of firebomber's mom suspended

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Closure for the Jewish community in the April 2004 firebombing of a Jewish school's library appears far off after what was to be the two-day trial of the mother of the perpetrator was suspended on Friday.

Rouba El-Merhebi Fahd, 39, is charged with being an accessory after the fact to her son Sleiman El-Merhebi's arson at the United Talmud Torahs in St. Laurent. She has been free on $10,000 bail since her arraignment in May 2004. She faces a maximum of seven years' imprisonment if convicted.

Quebec Court Judge Robert Marchi granted defence lawyer Marc Poupart's request for more time to prepare his case after Sleiman's surprise testimony for the prosecution contradicted police-wiretapped conversations played in court.

Poupart and the Crown were due back in court this week to set a date in the fall, not for the resumption of the trial, but to determine the admissibility of the prosecution's evidence, with Sleiman expected to once again take the stand.

Evidence collected by bugging the family phone found that El-Merhebi Fahd called a travel agent in the month after the crime asking about buying a ticket to Brazil for a departure within that week or the next. Asked when the return would be, she answers, "maybe three months."

El-Merhebi Fahd, who did not testify, never bought the ticket.

In another wiretapped conversation that was taken inside Sleiman's car, which was key in his arrest, he admits to two friends that he set the fire at the school. He wonders if he'll go to jail, saying that the act was not vandalism, but "terrorism." He talks about leaving for Brazil, Mexico or Cuba,

In court last Friday, he testified that his mother didn't know that he set the fire and that a trip to Brazil had been considered "for personal reasons" before he committed the crime. He insisted no steps were taken to have him leave Canada.

Sleiman said he told his mother the six gallons of kerosene he brought home were for a camping trip. He said his mother didn't ask why he threw out his kerosene-smelling clothes after he committed the arson.

The trial was suspended for several minutes to allow Sleiman El-Merhebi to "refresh [his] memory" after saying he couldn't remember much. Following along with a transcript, he asked that the tape be stopped a couple of times.

Sleiman, now 21, was sentenced in January 2005 to 40 months in jail for the arson, to which he pleaded guilty, and was released as mandated by law in May 2006. He still lives in Montreal.

Olmert sees new peace push

Opinion

By LESLIE SUSSER

With a new government emerging in the West Bank, one without Hamas, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert believes that Israel and the Palestinians can resume peace talks from where they left off when Hamas swept to power in national elections 18 months ago.

Hamas' violent takeover of the Gaza Strip last week has brought two separate Palestinian entities, radicals in Gaza and moderates in the West Bank. That constitutes a major change in the Israeli-Palestinian equation.

It means those in charge in Gaza can no longer encourage terror attacks and blame them on others. It means Israel can sit down quietly with the West Bank moderates and discuss a better future for both sides.

But it also means that in Gaza, Israel has what critics of the 2005 disengagement predicted would fill the vacuum created by its withdrawal, an Iranian-backed base on its doorstep.

The new situation, which no one quite knows how to handle, has generated a spate of creative thinking inside and outside Israeli government.

Soon after Gaza fell to the radicals, Olmert made it clear that he intends to evolve much different policies for dealing with the Hamas regime in Gaza and the more moderate Fatah government in the West Bank.

It is not simply a question of divide and rule. Olmert has argued that as long as Hamas was part of the Palestinian government, peacemaking was impossible. Now that there are effectively two separate authorities, he believes Israel can work with the moderates and ignore the radicals.

The new thinking raises a number of questions: Will Hamas sit back and allow Israel and Fatah to build a thriving West Bank as an alternative model for a Palestinian future? Will the moderates be able to hold onto power in the West Bank, or will Hamas topple them there, too? And with Hamas in control in Gaza, how far will Olmert be able to go in peacemaking efforts that once envisaged a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza?

On Sunday, Palestinian President Mahmoud Abbas of Fatah reinforced the two-entity approach when he swore in a new emergency government in the West Bank without Hamas members. He described the Hamas takeover in Gaza as an "armed insurrection" and declared illegal the Hamas government there of Palestinian Authority Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh.

Abbas said the new government's first goal would be getting the international sanctions against the Palestinians lifted. The sanctions were imposed because of Hamas' participation in the government.

Olmert has made it clear already that Israel would be ready to release about $562 million in Palestinian tax money, since the danger of the funds falling into militants' hands has mostly been eliminated. Moreover, Israel probably will want to co-operate with the international community in transforming the West Bank economically. The aim is to create new hope for the West Bank moderates through major investment and political dialogue.

As to Gaza, the government will regard it as an enemy entity, and enforce an economic and a military blockade while taking steps to prevent a humanitarian crisis.

Explaining the new approach to Gaza, Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh said the government anticipated humanitarian problems because "Gaza is controlled by reckless gangs who don't care about the civilian population." But he said Israel would be "attentive" to humanitarian requests from international agencies, would find ways to allow food and medicine to go through, and would not cut off water and electricity supplies to Gaza.

The challenge for Israel is to prevent a humanitarian crisis, for which it would be blamed, while fighting terror and preventing the continued influx of weaponry, especially across the Egyptian border.

One idea that's been broached: an international force to move in along the border. Hamas, however, said it would not allow foreign troops, and the odds are remote that potential participants would be prepared to take on the militants.

A second option would be to beef up Egypt's border presence, but that is unlikely to be any more effective than it has been so far.

Therefore, some analysts are saying, Israel eventually will have to move in and smash Hamas as a military force.

Likud opposition leader Benjamin Netanyahu, one of the most outspoken critics of the 2005 disengagement, suggests working with the international community to weaken Iran and its proxies.

"Israel will not be able to tolerate the existence and growth of an Iranian base on the outskirts of Tel Aviv and Beersheba," he said.

Maj.-Gen. (Res.) Yaakov Amidror, a former head of intelligence analysis, argues that Israel will have to launch a major military operation to topple Hamas and then reoccupy Gaza to stop the radicals from coming to power again.

Israel Hasson of the hawkish Yisrael Beiteinu party recommends declaring Gaza an enemy state and letting it go on its own, a proposal he made even before the Hamas takeover.

On the left, Carmi Gillon, a former Shin Bet Security Services chief, sees a short window of opportunity. Gillon says the West Bank poses a much more acute security problem for Israel than Gaza because it has a much longer border, proximity to major population centres and many Jewish settlers.

But he says with Hamas being much weaker in the West Bank than in Gaza, Israel should encourage Fatah to crush the militants in the West Bank and then pacify the area further by cutting a deal with the moderates. Gillon proposes creating conditions for positive dialogue by unfreezing tax money, releasing Fatah prisoners and lifting roadblocks.

Maj.-Gen. (Res.) Doron Almog is among the few commentators to recommend talking to Hamas. Almog says Israel should discuss a long-term cease-fire with the radicals while taking steps to stop the influx of weapons.

Ironically, the Hamas takeover could help stabilize Israeli-Palestinian relations. In the case of attacks from Gaza, Israel could take much tougher action. And in the West Bank, there could be the beginnings of a modus vivendi.

Much will depend now on how all the main actors – Israel, the United States, Iran, the moderate Arab states, Fatah and Hamas – play their new hands.

With Lauder leading, WJC looks to end inner strife

By JACOB BERKMAN

JTA

NEW YORK — With the election of Ronald Lauder, 63, as its interim president, the World Jewish Congress hopes to put aside years of turmoil from political infighting and allegations of financial mismanagement.

Lauder, the cosmetics heir and president of the Jewish National Fund, defeated Mendel Kaplan, the South African steel magnate and former chair of the Jewish Agency for Israel, in a 59-17 vote Sunday of the organization's board of governors.

He succeeds Edgar Bronfman, who retired Sunday after serving nearly 30 years as president. The board of governors overwhelmingly voted in Bronfman's son, Matthew, as its chair. Matthew Bronfman, the chair of the WJC's finance committee, was running as part of a ticket with Lauder and was unopposed.

Also Sunday, the WJC's secretary general, Stephen Herbits, said in a report to the governing board that he would resign if Lauder and Matthew Bronfman were chosen.

Earlier in the day, the WJC executive committee had voted 11-4 to recommend Lauder to the board.

The WJC is best known for securing billions in Holocaust restitution funds and fighting anti-Semitism, but its reputation has suffered as a result of the turmoil of the past several years.

It also has experienced a 33 percent decline in fundraising over the first quarter of 2007 and faces an ongoing audit by the Internal Revenue Service.

In March Edgar Bronfman fired his longtime powerbroker and friend, Rabbi Israel Singer, amid accusations of financial improprieties.

That firing and the subsequent announcement of Edgar Bronfman's retirement led to intense political infighting among those jockeying for the organization's top lay spot.

That carried over to Sunday, as the executive committee meeting at WJC headquarters was marked by intense bickering over electoral procedures.

Board member Shai Hermesh walked out and did not return, telling JTA later that the WJC's Israel delegation had been "insulted" in the selection of a nominating committee for the elections.

During their speeches to the board of governors, Lauder spoke of the need for improved Jewish education around the world, and Wilf said the organization potentially could provide a forum to build Jewish unity among the religious streams and age groups.

Kaplan gave perhaps the most impassioned speech.

He told the governing board that it must move past depending financially on "one or two individuals."

Edgar Bronfman reportedly kept the organization afloat during his tenure as president, giving some $2 million per year to the WJC.

While Lauder acknowledged to JTA that he has made a financial commitment to the WJC, he said he did not want to discuss the details of that commitment until a later date.

Kaplan said above all, the WJC must move past its infighting.

"What you really have is what you create for others, not what you do for yourself," he told the governing board.

Lauder will serve as interim president until 2009.

The mood was conciliatory after the election.

"I think this will be a new chapter in terms of the unity of the organization and intergenerational co-operation in terms of the Lauder generation and the Matthew Bronfman generation," Rabbi Marc Schneier, the chair of the WJC's American section and a steering committee member, told JTA.

Kaplan's main supporter, European Jewish Congress President Pierre Besnainou, said he was looking forward to reconciliation.

"It was a democratic decision, and I have to congratulate Ron Lauder. He made a good campaign," Besnainou told JTA.

Much of the resuscitation of the WJC may hinge upon who becomes the next secretary general.

During Edgar Bronfman's tenure, he was seen as the face of the organization. Rabbi Israel Singer was its primary strategist and deal maker.

Herbits, once a top adviser to former Defence Secretary Donald Rumsfeld and an adviser to Edgar Bronfman at Seagram, was brought in three years ago to clean up things amid charges of mismanagement.

Much of the acrimony at the WJC has centered on Herbits, who was seen by some as a bulldog in cleaning up the organization. Before Herbits came aboard as secretary general, while he was serving as an adviser to Edger Bronfman, top officials Elan Steinberg and Isi Leibler were pushed out after Leibler raised concerns about WJC finances.

During Herbits' tenure, Singer and another top WJC official, Bobby Brown, were dismissed. Also, the finances of the WJC's Israel office came under scrutiny.

Herbits chafed when asked about his resignation, saying he had only "handed in his resignation" and that it had not yet been accepted.

Lauder would not say whether the resignation would be accepted and, if it was, who might replace Herbits.

Singer leaves Claims Conference

By JACOB BERKMAN

JTA

NEW YORK — Another chapter in the Israel Singer saga closed this week when he announced that he would not run for another term as president of the Claims Conference, the lead organization on Holocaust restitution.

Singer, who had been president of the organization since 2002, sent its chair Julius Berman, a note notifying him that he would not run for another term.

"There was absolutely no deal connected to my decision," Singer told JTA in an e-mail exchange. "The decision not to run was a personal one that was reached after discussions with my family and some colleagues."

The decision leaves open the question of who will lead the organization, known officially as the Conference on Jewish Material Claims Against Germany.

Once considered a Jewish hero for his work with the World Jewish Congress during the movement to free Soviet Jewry and for his work with the WJC and the Claims Conference in negotiating Holocaust restitution settlements, Singer had become a lightning rod within both organizations.

Longtime WJC President Edgar Bronfman fired Singer from his senior position at the WJC in March because, Bronfman and WJC Secretary-General Stephen Herbits claimed, Singer nefariously mishandled WJC money.

His firing polarized the WJC; it was met with an outcry from his many loyalists. And when Bronfman announced in May that he would retire from the WJC on June 10, many in the WJC lined up according to their allegiance to Singer. They either backed Jewish National Fund President Ronald Lauder, or Mendel Kaplan, who many thought might have brought Singer back into the organization. Lauder was elected Sunday to lead the WJC as interim president.

The conference is comprised of 24 organizations, including the WJC, each with two voting members, as well as 10 rotating members.

As president, Singer was the face of the organization and its chief negotiator, but he had no role in the allocations process.

The Claims Conference negotiating team will hold its annual restitution negotiations with the German government this month, but it is not clear if Singer will participate.

Israel wonders how to deal with Gaza

So would safeguards, in terms of training and equipment, to prevent Fatah-linked forces in the West Bank from folding to Hamas the way they did in Gaza. Fatah has a much stronger presence in the West Bank than it did in Gaza.

Given Israel's presence in the West Bank, new training and arms for Fatah there would require a green light from Jerusalem. But Olmert sounded circumspect.

"I look at the Fatah fighting now in Gaza, and I don't see any of the commanders in the area," he told the New York Times in an interview. "Where have they been?"

Everyone wants to "help the moderates and provide them with weapons," he said. "But it's another thing to ask yourself, 'If I'm going to give weapons, and these weapons are going to be taken by Hamas, what am I doing?'"

Jacob Walles, the U.S. diplomat who deals with Abbas, told Reuters that Washington would see "no obstacles" to fully re-engaging with the Palestinian Authority under the new government. An end to the aid embargo imposed by the Quartet of foreign mediators – the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union -- would be sure to follow.

Yet it remained unclear how much, if any, funding would reach Gaza now that it is effectively a Hamas fiefdom.

Meanwhile, Israeli authorities are trying to figure out how best to deal with Gaza. A major Israeli energy firm, Dor Alon, announced Sunday it was cutting back fuel supplies to Gaza.

"We should simply increase the isolation of Gaza from Judea and Samaria," National Infrastructure Minister Benjamin Ben-Eliezer told Army Radio, using the biblical terms for the West Bank. "I want to stop everything until we understand what is going on there."

But Deputy Defence Minister Ephraim Sneh said there were no plans for a complete stranglehold on the impoverished Gaza Strip.

"We won't cut off electricity and water. We won't add to the crisis," Sneh told Israel Radio, but added: "Israel is not Ismail Haniyeh's welfare office."

There is always a military option, something Ehud Barak will have to deal with when he is confirmed as Israel's new defence minister Monday.

Britain's Sunday Times newspaper reported that Barak already has drawn up plans for a major Gaza invasion to crush Hamas should it dramatically step up cross-border rocket salvos or resume suicide bombings.

But Hamas, for now, appears loath to enter a new confrontation with Israel. Instead it is expected to try to consolidate its Gaza power base, coax Abbas into a new coalition and smuggle in arms from Egypt for a future war.

That leaves the option of drawing foreign peacekeepers into southern Gaza, an idea Olmert has proposed and will try to develop in his talks with Ban and Bush. He was to meet with Ban on Monday and Bush on Tuesday.

While those meetings were scheduled long before last week's war among the Palestinians, they are certain to take on a new urgency as Israel, the United States and the world community figure out how to deal with a new reality.

In related developments, Peter MacKay, minister of foreign affairs and minister of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency, made the following statement on the new Palestinian emergency government:

"Canada supports the efforts of Palestinian President Abbas and his decision to dissolve the government. We will work with the new Palestinian government led by Prime Minister Salam Fayyad and are looking at how Canada can best provide assistance to his government.

"Canada will continue to respond to the humanitarian needs of Palestinian people, including refugees. We continue to support the voices of moderation within Palestinian society to help bring peace and stability."

Cotler calls UN report one-sided

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It was a fortuitous turn of events that saw law professor Irwin Cotler in Geneva to address a UN human rights agency at the same time the organization received a special report from Gaza.

As a board member of UN Watch, he was planning to address several troubling steps being considered by the UN Human Rights Council that would, he contends, "institutionalize the condemnation of Israel as a standing item on the agenda."

Though he did manage to include a critique of those proposals, he tailored his remarks to address what he termed the inherent bias of the investigation of the November 2006 Beit Hanoun incident in which Israeli artillery killed 19 Palestinians while responding to Qassam rocket attacks from Gaza.

Irwin Cotler

In a telephone interview from Geneva where he was attending the Council meetings, Cotler said he had been asked to join South African Archbishop Desmond Tutu in the investigation of the incident, but turned down the request (which came from fellow Canadian Louise Arbour, UN High Commissioner for Human Rights) because, "I could not accept a mandate to hear only one side of a dispute."

Addressing the Council last week, Cotler said, "The terms of reference deliberately ignored the Palestinian rocket attacks on the Israeli city of Sderot that preceded Israel's actions.

"How could one accept a mandate that violated the right to a fair hearing and fundamental due process?"

"The mandate also violated the presumption of innocence" by condemning "'the Israeli wilful killing of Palestinian civilians,'" he said. "How could one accept a fact-finding mission, a kind of Alice-in-Wonderland inquiry, where the conviction was secured and the sentence passed even before the inquiry began?"

Despite Cotler's reservations, the investigation did proceed, with British law professor Christine Chinkin joining Archbishop Tutu to examine the incident.

Although Archbishop Tutu and Chinkin were unable to visit Beit Hanoun, they submitted a report "based on available information," a UN press release stated.

"It is clear that significant human rights violations resulted in Beit Hanoun from the activities of the Israel Defence Force on and around Nov. 8 and that those events must be investigated by an independent, impartial and transparent process, preferably at the national level," they reported.

It also found that "the IDF must place at the centre of their decision-making and activities in the occupied Palestinian territories the consequences of the use of force on civilians....Regardless of whether the casualties at Beit Hanoun were caused by mistake, recklessness, criminal negligence or were wilful, those responsible must be held accountable."

Archbishop Tutu, in presenting the report, said "Israeli and Palestinian authorities should end the culture of impunity and bring to account those responsible, including those responsible for launching rockets against Israeli towns."

At the time of the Beit Hanoun incident, Israel has apologized for the strike, saying it was caused by a technical mistake in the artillery battery's guidance system.

Cotler said the pre-determination of Israel's guilt could be found in the mission's terms of reference.

The Council's special session Resolution S-3/1 emphasizes "Israeli wilful killing of Palestinian civilians," but it also called Israel's military incursion into Gaza, which preceded the shelling accident, "a continued violation...of the human rights of the Palestinian people" and "a collective punishment of the civilians [in Gaza]."

Cotler said the investigation into the Beit Hanoun incident is part of a pattern in the Council of singling out Israel for "discriminatory treatment" while ignoring the Palestinians' role in the conflict.

It also demonstrates "an obsessive preoccupation with Israel that results in the major human rights violators enjoying exculpatory immunity" from their gross violation of human rights. He noted that neither Sudan nor Iran have been condemned by the Council as Israel has.

The Council, he said, was considering making permanent its special rapporteur on the Mideast conflict, further "institutionalizing" its anti-Israel bias.

"The tragedy is that this is taking place under the protective cover of the United Nations and the imprimatur of international law and human rights."

"Because I take the United Nations seriously, I don't want it to be an instrument to assault human rights, but to protect human rights," he said.

Israel Briefs

New satellite operational

Israel's Defence Ministry announced that the Ofeq-7 satellite, launched last week, has ssuccessfully entered orbit and is broadcasting ground photographs on schedule. Ofeq-7 is intended to boost Israel's surveillance of enemies such as Iran and Syria. It will remain in orbit for four years before burning out.

Rocket hits Negev school

A Qassam rocket launched from Gaza hit a Negev high school. The rocket struck last Wednesday morning near the Sha'ar Hanegev High School's music classroom, shattering windows but causing no injuries, Yediot Achronot reported. "Fortunately there were no students at the place at the time of the attack," said Alon Shuster, head of the Sha'ar Hanegev regional council.

U.K. Tory a 'Zionist'

The leader of Britain's Conservative party called himself a Zionist and slammed the initiative for an academic boycott of Israel. David Cameron, responding to questions at the annual luncheon of the Conservative Friends of Israel, said the academic boycott was completely uncalled for and that attacks against Israel often slid into anti-Semitism, Ha'aretz reported. "If by Zionist you mean that the Jews have the right to a homeland in Israel and the right to a country then I am a Zionist," Cameron said.

Universities fight boycott

Seven major Israeli universities are uniting to fight a major British trade union's vote to consider a boycott of Israeli academics. The schools will launch an ad campaign in U.S. media, including the New York Times, to highlight the contributions of Israeli universities. For example, the ads will note that Ben-Gurion University of the Negev prevented millions in Africa and China from going blind or even dying by creating a biological control for mosquitoes and black flies that cause malaria and river blindness.

Israelis like their lives: Poll

An overwhelming majority of Israelis are satisfied with their lives, a survey found. Eighty-three per cent of Jewish Israelis say they are satisfied or extremely satisfied with their lives, according to the Central Bureau of Statistics' annual Social Survey 2006, released last week, the Jerusalem Post reported. Nearly three-quarters of Israeli Arabs said they feel the same way. For the haredi community, the figure was 97 per cent, while for the traditional and secular segments of the population, the figure was 82 and 85 per cent, respectively. The survey questioned 7,300 people.

Middle East peace on your PC? Could be

By MITCHELL SCHNURBACH
Special to Heebonics/CJN

PEACEMAKER™
Play the News. Solve the Puzzle.

Have you ever thought you could do a better job at resolving the Israeli/Palestinian conflict than the current leaders in the Middle East? A computer game called PeaceMaker gives you just that chance to prove yourself.

The game, created by ImpactGames of Pennsylvania, was first revealed to the world in 2005 at the Games Developers Conference in San Francisco. In it, you choose whether to play the role of the Israeli Prime Minister or Palestinian President with the ultimate objective of reaching a two state solution.

Under each scenario, you try to win the approval of your own people while balancing their needs against exterior forces.

As the Israeli Prime Minister, you need to gain the approval of the Palestinian people. As the Palestinian President, world approval is your objective.

What makes the game so difficult is that more often than not, what pleases one side displeases the other. While your approval rating amongst Palestinians might soar if you opt to begin removing portions of the security fence, you also risk sparking major protests across Israel.

"The game is structured in a way that penalizes users for imbalanced gameplay," wrote Asi Burak, co-founder and COO of ImpactGames, in an e-mail to Heebonics/CJN.

"If you are taking extreme measures and ignore the other side's wants you will lose. In the same way, you might lose by running into concessions without building support among your own people. So, it is not really a 'sandbox' but a contained experience with clear messages."

The game also doesn't desensitize the playing experience by peppering you with stylized cartoon violence, like so many other computer games based on real life conflicts.

This is not a game for the Grand Theft Auto crowd.

The graphics are limited to a rudimentary map of Israel, plus boxes and drop down menus to help you choose your options. The photographic, video and audio footage that portrays incidents in the game, is culled from actual events and media that have occurred in the region.

PeaceMaker is based entirely on the decisions you make. And just like in real life, every action sparks a reaction. Depending on whether you opt to take the hawkish or dovish route, your approval rating increases and/or decreases.

Various Internet reviews of PeaceMaker have claimed the game is impossible to win; however, Burak disputes that assumption.

"The rumors are not true. There is definitely a way to win both sides... as the Israeli Prime Minister and the Palestinian President," Burak said. "In fact, while some players could never beat the game, others blamed us for being too optimistic and claimed it was 'too easy' for them."

While reviewing the game, Heebonics/CJN was only able to win just once; and that while playing as the Israeli Prime Minister, using an approach offering many concessions to the Palestinians while remaining tough against militants on both sides.

But Burak insisted there are other ways to achieve peace in the game. "There is no one model, formula or scenario, but multiple paths that are affected by random events and complex relations with the other groups or leaders," he said.

The game is also programmed so that the United States, European Union and United Nations operate as supporting actors in the resolution of the conflict. There is no option that allows you to play the role of United States president and draw up a new "road-map for peace", for example.

This was a conscious decision on the part of the game's developers.

"We actually wanted to emphasize the responsibility and the initiative of the stakeholders themselves," Burak said. "One of our core assumptions is 'you can make a difference.' i.e., a leader in the region can help to make progress and build trust with the other side."

While some might wonder if the existence of any "game" based on such a serious situation is appropriate, PeaceMaker was not created to exploit the situation, but rather to educate and inform.

Secrets of easy entertaining from a culinary expert

By NORENE GILLETZ

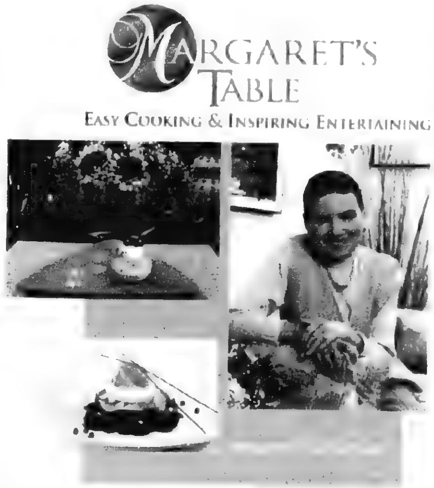
Summertime is just around the corner, and although I enjoy entertaining friends and family, I don't enjoy spending time in the kitchen when the weather is warm and sunny.

I'm always on the lookout for simple solutions to entertaining, so I was delighted to discover the award-winning cookbook Margaret's Table – Easy Cooking & Inspiring Entertaining by Margaret Dickenson of Ottawa.

From among thousands of cookbooks, her book was recognized as the best entertaining cookbook in the world at the 2006 Gourmand World Cookbook Awards. The book reveals 40 years of Dickenson's easy and practical entertaining "secrets."

Dickenson is an award-winning international cookbook author, recipe developer and TV host. She inspires her readers with innovative recipes and clever presentations.

With her husband, Larry, who did the photography, she published Margaret's Table. This book's recipes are a treat for the eye and the palate. It includes 180 personally created recipes, six of which have won international awards in three different competitions, and 25 menus.



Try these "No Time, No Talent" recipes from Margaret's Table, and you'll look like a talented chef in no time! They're perfect for entertaining your guests, and if you follow her culinary advice, you can master the art of preparing a beautiful, elegant table with ease. Enjoy…

QUICK GRILLED SALMON STEAKS/FILLETS WITH NUTTY MANGO SALSA

For many, grilled salmon is irresistible, particularly if it is cooked to perfection. With this in mind, Dickenson has developed grilling techniques that work wonderfully, whether you use the barbecue, a grill pan or heavy skillet, on their own or in combination with oven baking. Serve it with Nutty Mango Salsa, a stunning melange of nuts, fresh mango and coriander, with seductive notes of honey and spice. Fast and impressive, this is great with wild salmon as well. It's equally appealing served hot, warm or at room temperature. Serve with a simple accompaniment of baked or mashed potatoes and broccoli or asparagus.

4 salmon steaks, at least 1 inch thick (8 oz. each)
1⅓ tbsp. olive oil (4 tsp.)
1 tbsp. peeled and grated fresh ginger root salt and crushed black peppercorns to taste
¾ cup Zesty Ginger Mayonnaise, below (optional)

Nutty Mango Salsa:
1½ cups diced (¼-inch) mango flesh
2½ tbsp. chopped fresh coriander leaves
1 tbsp. finely diced onion (peeled)
¾ tsp. hot chili paste
1½ tsp. honey
⅓ cup coarsely chopped macadamia nuts
3 tbsp. coarsely chopped pecans
garnish: fresh herbs and/or edible flowers (optional)

Nutty Mango Salsa: with a fork, toss together mango, coriander leaves and onions; set aside. (Note: salsa may be prepared to this point up to 12 hours in advance and stored refrigerated in an airtight plastic container.)

Season with salt and crushed black peppercorns; place salmon on a well-oiled and preheated very hot barbecue grill over direct heat with lid up. Grill first side for 1½ minutes until brown grill marks appear. Turn salmon over and grill second side for 1 minute. Immediately, close lid, reduce heat to medium and cook until central core is still translucent, about another 3 minutes. Avoid overcooking.

Remove from heat and promptly cover salmon closely with aluminum foil (shiny side in) for at least 4 minutes to keep in heat and to allow for more even cooking. Add chili paste, honey and nuts to mango salsa; toss. Makes almost 2 cups salsa.

Top salmon with Nutty Mango Salsa. If desired, garnish with fresh herbs and/or edible flowers. Serve with Zesty Ginger Mayonnaise/Sauce.

Option: salmon fillets may be cooked in a similar manner. (Note: sear flesh side first, and if finishing the cooking in the oven, arrange the fillets skin side down on baking tray.)

Zesty Ginger Mayonnaise: Whisk together ¼ cup mayonnaise, 1 tbsp. peeled and grated fresh ginger root, 1 tsp. granulated sugar and if desired, a pinch of wasabi.

Alternative Cooking Technique: after searing the salmon on both sides (i.e., after 2½ minutes) on the barbecue, transfer the salmon to a parchment-lined baking tray. Place it in a preheated oven at 350 until the central core is still translucent, about 3 minutes. (Note: this is a useful technique when limited time is available for supervising the barbecue or when preparing large quantities of grilled salmon.)

Alternative to Barbecuing: use a well-oiled preheated grill pan or skillet set over medium-high heat. Sear the salmon exactly as outlined above. Immediately transfer it to a parchment-paper-lined baking tray and complete the cooking in a preheated 350-degree oven until the central core is still translucent, about 3 minutes. Continue as above. Makes 4 servings.

BLUEBERRY OR POMEGRANATE AND ALMOND RICE SALAD

Dickenson has a passion for developing versatile recipes. Doing more with basically the same recipe and reducing it mainly to an assembly process thrills her to no end. For example, she tosses cooked rice with cumin, garlic and chopped fresh parsley, then moistens it with wonderful drizzles of olive oil and mayonnaise to produce the base for a myriad of rice salads. Additions of berries or chips of fruit offer the fresh taste of a particular season, while toasted slivered almonds provide a satisfying crunch.

3 cups cooked long-grain rice, chilled or at room temperature
¾ to 1 tsp. ground cumin
½ tsp. finely chopped fresh garlic
1½ to 2 tbsp. mayonnaise
2 to 3 tsp. olive oil (preferably garlic infused) salt to taste
1 cup fresh blueberries, pomegranate seeds or dried cranberries (see tips below)
3 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley
⅓ cup toasted slivered almonds
1 to 1⅓ tbsp. mustard/herb vinaigrette (optional)

Toss rice, cumin and garlic together. Whisk together mayonnaise and oil; drizzle over seasoned rice and toss to combine evenly. Add salt to taste.

Fold in fruit and parsley. Refrigerate for at least an hour if possible or until ready to use. (Note: the salad may be prepared to this point up to 8 hours in advance. If stored longer, the rice tends to toughen.)

Just before serving, add toasted almonds and toss. If desired, drizzle with vinaigrette according to taste and toss. Makes about 4 cups (5 to 6 servings)

Tips:
- Serve this salad as an accompaniment to salmon, chicken, lamb or veal. For buffet and pot luck events, it imparts a tasty and original dimension to the menu.
- Blueberries create a mild but wonderfully refreshing salad particularly for summer entertaining.
- Pomegranate seeds or dried cranberries are particularly appropriate for the holiday season; 1½ to 2 fresh pomegranates are required. Cut the fruit in half and carefully remove the seeds. Discard the skin and the white pulp.

Environmental awareness growing in Israel

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Environmental awareness is just beginning to take hold in Israel – and not a moment too soon, according to Green Zionist activist Noam Dolgin.

"Israel is about 30 years behind the United States in most trends," said Dolgin, who is the chair of the six-year-old American-based Green Zionist Alliance.

Israel's environmental movement currently consists of small groups campaigning around local issues, he said, but environmental consciousness is growing.

Dolgin was in Winnipeg over the May long weekend to lead a Shabbaton that was organized by Adamah'Nitoba, a local Jewish ecology organization.

Prior to the Shabbaton, Dolgin, whose father is originally from Winnipeg, spoke to students at the Gray Academy and at a gathering at Congregation Etz Chayim.

He provided a historical overview of the Jewish relationship with the land and noted that since the establishment of the State of Israel, concern for the well-being of the land has taken a back seat to economic development, politics and security.

Dolgin spoke about air pollution in Israel, citing reports that indicate 1,400 Israelis in the Tel Aviv-Ashdod area die every year from exposure to polluted air.

Reports he cited also indicate water shortages are getting worse, although Israel has opened a second desalination plant in Ashdod. Israel ranks 88 out of 122 countries in terms of water quality, and the Dead Sea is rapidly disappearing, he said.

Israeli environmental issues include solid waste disposal, he said, noting that the "garbage mountain" outside Tel Aviv has been closed and is to be converted into a park. Overpopulation and species extinction are other pressing issues, he added.

While Israeli technology is second to none in coming up with environmentally friendly solutions, Dolgin noted that almost all of the technology is exported to places such as Africa and California and very little has yet been adopted in Israel itself.

There are a number of national environmental groups that have formed in Israel in recent years, Dolgin said, and they are having some effect.

The oldest is the 17-year-old Israel Union for Environmental Defense, which through legal advocacy fights for reductions in air pollution, safe drinking water, solid waste management and accessible open spaces.

The Heschel Centre for Environmental Learning and Leadership is a meeting place for people who wish to develop alternative environmental, social and cultural visions.

The Arava Institute for Environmental Studies, located at Kibbutz Ketura in the Arava, emphasizes peace and sustainable development.

The Society for the Protection of Nature in Israel seeks ways to promote growth, while at the same time protecting Israel's environmental heritage.

Friends of the Earth, Middle East brings together Israeli, Palestinian and Jordanian environmentalists in co-operative efforts.

Dolgin said that his Green Zionist Alliance hopes to elect more delegates to the World Zionist Congress, including representatives from Canada, the United Kingdom and Australia. In Canada, voters have to be members of a Zionist organization, while in the United States, any member of the Jewish community over 18 can vote in a WZC election.

Q. I am wondering if fruits and vegetables are equally nutritious whether they are cooked or raw.

A. The answer depends on which fruit or vegetable. Some fruits and vegetables lose a great deal of their nutrition when cooked, and particularly when they are overcooked, so always try to not overcook them. Blueberries, for example, lose much of their nutritional benefit when cooked for a long time, and thus a blueberry pie will have far less nutritional benefit than fresh blueberries.

About
Nutrition

However, carrots and tomatoes actually become increasingly nutritious when cooked for prolonged periods. The lycopenes in tomatoes, which come from their vibrant colour and are believed to help prevent prostate cancer, are in much higher concentration in cooked tomato dishes like tomato sauce than in fresh tomatoes. Carrots, because of the complexity of their fibre structure, are difficult for our bodies to break down, and we don't absorb much of their nutrients when they are raw. Therefore, boiling them until they are soft makes more vitamins available for absorption. Of course, eating all fruits and vegetables, cooked or raw, is very important and healthful.

Q. I take an iron supplement and I would like to know if I should avoid taking it with any foods.

A. Yes. Dairy foods interfere with the absorption of iron significantly. You should avoid consuming dairy products within two hours of taking your iron supplement. Furthermore, there is new research suggesting that coffee and tea also prevent ideal absorption and you should also avoid these.

Another good tip if you have low iron is this: when you eat red meat, you should have it at the same meal with foods rich in vitamin C, like broccoli, cauliflower, bell peppers, cantaloupe, oranges and strawberries, and you will better absorb the iron from the meat.

Lastly, if your doctor has prescribed an iron supplement for you because your iron or ferritin is low, and particularly if your hemoglobin is low, be sure to take it! If you cannot get your iron level up from food alone, a supplement is the best way to go.

A South African's journey of self-discovery

By SHERRY SMITHER
Special to The CJN

Picture this: she's in her 90s, snuggled up in blankets on her love seat for warmth, and the heat in her apartment is jacked up so high a desert seems cool in comparison.

In walks her grandson, the writer. He's there to question her about her past – research for his upcoming book.

Instead, she questions him. Repeatedly. She asks if he's making money, tells him to get a real job, and when he's ready to leave… she slips him a twenty.

Poplak, aware that many South African writers are known for their dark, visionary voices, chose to "bring the book alive in a different way, to attract a different audience," he explains over the phone from Dubai.

"Humour is essential for me. I don't know how else to communicate. And I've experimented with other voices as one does. I was going to do it through my voice – the humorous voice – or I didn't see a point in doing it at all."

Currently, the 34-year-old journalist is travelling in the Middle East, Afghanistan and Pakistan, doing research for his next book, Omar Shamshoon Says D'oh!: Trawling the Muslim World for North American Pop Culture.

"As serious as the situation is in the Middle East and it's incredibly serious, it doesn't have much of a solution. The only way I can make sense of it is through humour, which is the driving force behind Ja, No, Man."

A witty storyteller, in the book, Poplak brilliantly recounts tales of his sadistic headmaster, "The Whistler"; his childhood maid, Bushy "The Coathanger"; and the censorship of "Muzak" and the "Test Patterns" by the "Powers That Were."

You'll laugh out loud at Poplak, who questions authority and pushes the limits, but you'll cry inside for his loss of innocence in a tribal society with hard and fast rules and strict ideologies.

Apartheid was law.

Poplak says Jews had it no tougher than any other "tribe" in South Africa.

"We were tolerated economically and to a degree socially with honorary white status," he recalls.

But when Poplak's Hebrew class was defaced by a "classroom maker-over neo-Nazi edition," the writer says it amounted to this: "It was shocking and it wasn't. If we hated them, then they hated us… it kind of all made sense."

Since, Poplak and his family moved to Canada, the "frozen north," shortly before Nelson Mandela's release from prison in 1990, he has had the advantage of looking at South Africa from the inside out and the outside in.

Richard Poplak

Not wanting to rely on memories alone on which to Ja, No, Man, Poplak packed up and headed to Suid Afrika for four months because "research was absolutely vital to bring the book together," he says.

"So much of Johannesburg feels like it was preserved in pickle juice. Returning gave me the ability to react to the sights and smells. It was essential to reawaken those feelings – the feeling of having a maid in the house, the feeling of rage bubbling up when you encounter that South African paradigm.

"A country like South Africa breeds very hard people – there's very little ability to put oneself in somebody else's shoes, which is indeed the ultimate act of imagination."

Poplak, aware he's come under criticism by fellow South Africans for this comment, defends his view.

"It crushed the little things… it crushed the ability to empathize, which is key for me," he says.

To restore his imagination, he needed to interact with people outside of the context of those strict regimental doctrines.

"This was hugely restorative. Certainly that process to try to shed the skin, to try to molt and grow has been a work in progress. I think it took me all through writing this book to be a fully empathic human being."

Film documents last days of journalist Daniel Pearl

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

A Mighty Heart, which opens on June 22, documents the final anguished days of Daniel Pearl, the hapless American foreign correspondent who was kidnapped and murdered by Islamic fundamentalists in Karachi, Pakistan, five years ago.

Michael Winterbottom's movie unfolds like a taut police procedural and has the feel of a quasi-documentary.

Adopted from his wife's memoir, A Mighty Heart: The Brave Life and Death of My Husband Danny Pearl, it is hardly surprising that Mariane Pearl is at the centre of this sad film. But this is not meant critically, for she is a smart, resourceful and engaging woman.

It takes place within a nine-day period between January and February 2002, from Pearl's abduction to his beheading and dismemberment. Since the story line will be familiar to most viewers, the film is framed by an aura of inevitability, yet it is hardly boring. Winterbottom manages to infuse it with a surprising degree of suspense and tension.

Pearl and his wife, a fellow journalist, arrived in Pakistan on Sept. 12, 2001, a day after 19 Arab hijackers turned a new, extremely deadly page in the annals of international terrorism. The South Asian bureau chief of the Wall Street Journal, Pearl was researching two interrelated stories when The National Movement for the Restoration of Pakistani Sovereignty abducted him.

He was investigating the case of Richard Reid, the British Muslim who was apprehended before he could detonate a shoe bomb aboard an American airliner bound from Paris to Miami. He was also studying the alleged links between Al Qaeda and Pakistan's secret intelligence service, the ISI.

In hot pursuit of a promising lead, he interviewed a Pakistani source who apparently was privy to valuable information. As he left for the meeting, from which he never returned, Pearl told Mariane that he might be late for a dinner party.

Murdered Jewish journalist subject of A Mighty Heart

Winterbottom injects a palpable sense of dread into these early scenes, which are set in a seething city that is at once chaotic and fetid.

In the hours leading up to his fateful encounter with his Pakistani interlocutor, Pearl, competently portrayed by Dan Futterman, is warned to be careful and urged to meet his contact in a public locale. This foreshadowing is quite chilling.

The menacing tone is heightened by a flashback – a device Winterbotttom uses again and again to tie up loose ends – in which Pearl interviews a jihadi who outlandishly claims that "the Jews" masterminded the events of Sept. 11.

As the surrealistic interview continues, the jihadi states with an assurance bordering on arrogance that the Mossad issued a warning to 4,000 Jewish World Trade Centre workers not to turn up that day. "What are you, Christian?" the jihadi then abruptly inquires. "Jewish," Pearl replies as the scene dissolves.

With Pearl missing for more than a day now, Mariane, played to perfection by Angelina Jolie, enlists her connections to find her beloved husband. Officials from Pakistani military intelligence, the U.S. Embassy and the FBI become involved in the manhunt.

Pearl's Jewish background is a significant factor in the unfolding crisis, and the impression conveyed is that Pakistan is a hotbed of anti-Semitism. In a hushed conversation with a seemingly sympathetic Pakistani official, Mariane confides that Pearl is Jewish. "Don't tell anybody," he advises.

The next day, however, a local newspaper reports that Pearl is suspected of being a Mossad agent who has been in touch with India's rival intelligence service. The kidnappers themselves claim that Pearl is a CIA operative. After video images of Pearl appear, his head bowed and his hands shackled, Pearl's Israeli-born father warns Mariane. "It's important not for anyone to know we're from Israel."

As the Pakistani government ratchets up its efforts to rescue Pearl, Mariane is granted a brief audience with the minister of the interior, a gruff and insensitive fellow who berates Pearl for having gotten himself into this mess and cynically blames India for the kidnapping

Following a false report that Pearl's corpse has turned up in a morgue, the Pakistani security services finally arrest a suspect. Under torture, he leads them to a jihadi named Ahmed Omar Saeed Sheikh.

The case is cracked wide open, but it is too late. Pearl has been killed. The murderer is Khalid Sheikh Mohammed (who is behind bars today in a U.S. prison in Guantanamo Bay, Cuba.) After being informed of the disheartening news, Mariane, six months pregnant and supremely composed until this moment, breaks into primal screams.

Having recovered from her initial shock, Mariane says that she will not be terrorized by brutal murderers, the predominant message of A Mighty Heart.

The concluding scenes are bitter-sweet as the film flashes back to their Jewish wedding, dwells on Pearl's plaintive last words before his decapitation and shifts to the birth of a child.

Haifa art school exhibit opens at Blue Dot Gallery

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

An eclectic show of works by the faculty and graduates of Haifa's art and design school opened last week at Toronto's Blue Dot Gallery.

The exhibit, from the Neri Bloomfield WIZO Academy of Design and Education, visited New York before opening in Toronto on June 14, for the show's only Canadian stop.

Academy president David Alexander, who attended the Toronto opening, said the school strives to make connections in North America and worldwide.

"Toronto is the right scene to be introduced to," he said. "It seemed right and there is something lovely about the gallery."

The exhibit features jewelry, photographs, prints and a "clothing" line made of recycled material such as milk bags and packaging from food and soap products. The clothing symbolizes the "dim economic situation in Israel," according to the exhibit's catalogue.

Most works are for sale and profits will go toward scholarships for students.

"There is not a single line or topic or theme but rather a variety of what interests faculty and students at this given moment," Alexander said.

The exhibit includes a family of puppets that represents the human race. The aim of the puppet display is to turn the puppet into an icon that would be identified with human rights and their violation.

There are prints of grown-up versions of childhood icons, including Sesame Street's Bert and Ernie on a gay pride parade float and the Little Mermaid in a wheelchair busking for change.

Other distinctive displays include portraits of world figures such as Albert Einstein and Che Guevera, their faces replaced by the female artist's.

However, he said that many of the more politically charged pieces stayed in Israel, because the academy did not want them to be "misinterpreted or misused" in North America.

These more controversial works will be on exhibit in the school's graduate show in Haifa beginning July 28.

The Neri Bloomfield WIZO Academy of Design and Education is the only Israeli school from which students graduate with a degree in art as well as receiving certification as a high school teacher.

Alexander said his students define the dual learning opportunity as a "win-win situation."

The Blue Dot Gallery is in the Distillery Historic District at 55 Mill St. Building 47. The Neri Bloomfield exhibit closes on July 1. For more information, call 416-487-1500.

ROBERT FULFORD TO SPEAK AT JEWISH BOOK AWARDS

Robert Fulford

Noted broadcaster, journalist and author Robert Fulford is slated to speak on the power of Jewish writing at the Helen and Stan Vine Annual Canadian Jewish Book Awards, at the Leah Posluns Theatre, June 21, 8 p.m. The sponsor is the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

Nearly a 20-year-old tradition, the Canadian Jewish Book Awards celebrates excellence in Canadian writing that reflects Jewish concerns and themes. In recent years 10 or more prizes are awarded annually in as many categories, a reflection of the increasing literary activity within the Canadian Jewish community.

Toronto author Susan Glickman has been named winner of the prestigious fiction prize for her novel The Violin Lovers. The attendant publicity is certain to raise the novel's profile and result in the secondary prize of higher book sales.

Michael Wex

Already enjoying a higher profile due to its long residency on the New York Times bestseller list is Michael Wex's entertaining and scholarly opus Born to Kvetch: Yiddish Language and Culture in All of its Moods, which wins for scholarship on a Jewish subject.

Other winners include Bernice Eisenstein in the Holocaust memoir and literature category for her graphic novel I Was a Child of Holocaust Survivors; Shirley Kumove, in literature and translation from Yiddish, for Drunk from the Bitter Truth: The Poems of Anna Margolin; Carol Matas, in children's and youth literature, for Turned Away: The World War II Diary of Devora Bernstein; and Eric Koch, Rosemary Sullivan, Rafi Aaron and Seymour Mayne.

The evening allows for the public to meet the honoured authors and to buy copies of their books for them to autograph. Come out and show your support for our literary community. Admission is free and everyone is invited.

Arts in Brief

- A Night For Ned is a benefit performance for Ned Vukovic, a theatre artist with Lou Gehrig's disease. Features Donald Carrier, Allegra Fulton, David Gale, Thea Gill, Janet Laine Green, Chas Lawther and Lenore Zann. Pre-show reception and viewing of silent auction items begins at 6 p.m., the show begins at 7 followed by celebration and auction. Theatre Passe Muraille, Sunday June 24. 416-504-7529, www.artsboxoffice.ca
- Actor, director and screenwriter Eugene Levy has taken on a new role – that of spokesman for an important cause, the need for a national autism strategy. He and Senator Jim Munsen spoke out on the subject at a Toronto press conference last week.

There is no cure for autism, but an effective, science-based treatment has been identified. However, it is not covered by provincial medicare.

Deb Filler

- Writer-performer Deb Filler performs excerpts from her acclaimed show Filler Up at the V. Reiss Gallery, where the Vivian Reiss exhibition, Colour in Motion, Portraits of Food is currently on view. June 28, 8 p.m.

* * *

At the Galleries

- Water, a series of paintings and drawings by Candida Girling, and Inkhorn, a series of 120 printed, painted and carved wood panels by Rochelle Rubinstein, are on view at the Loop Gallery, 1174 Queen St. W., June 23 to July 15. Opening reception, Thursday June 21, 6 to 9 p.m. 416-516-2581, www.loopgallery.ca
- A series of paintings by Josh Z. Bonder serves to bring into question the relationship between the creator and the observer. Propeller Centre for the Visual Arts, 984 Queen St. W. June 20 to July 1. Reception, Thursday June 21, 7 to 10 p.m. 416-504-7142. www.propellerctr.com
- Local fine art photographer Serge Chriqui opened a new Yorkville-area gallery this month. The Scollard Street Gallery, 112 Scollard (lower level), features works by Chriqui and other photographers. 647-436-9784.

Harvey Seigel

Passages: The late Harvey Seigel of Toronto made his living as a musician, but he loved it so much he would have probably done it for free. He played trombone and harmonica, and sang vocals, but didn't know how to read music. "He played totally by heart, soul and by ear," said his son, Jeffrey.

A lover of jazz, particularly Dixieland, Harvey played with his own band and numerous others all over the country, and was well-known on the bar-mitzvah and wedding circuit. He also played at Blue Jay baseball games, at Woodbine racetrack, and various other special events.

"Harvey could improvise harmonies and contrapuntal melodies with the best musicians the city had to offer," recalled his friend, pianist Fern Dworkin.

"He would do a sophisticated ballroom soiree in a hotel one day, followed by a strolling Dixieland gig the next day. He delighted in having the musicians dress up in ragtime attire, or Santa Claus hats, or bow ties, or whatever he knew would bring a smile to an audience. Harvey could woo a docile audience into participating full throttle in singing, playing, clapping hands and dancing."

Harvey was born in Hamilton in 1937 and died recently at age 70. He is survived by wife Sandra, sons Jeffrey and Sheldon, and brothers Sid and Bob. Last Sunday, his band played a tribute concert in his memory at Scarborough Town Centre.

Jewish artists sing and speak at Jazz Festival

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Summertime and the listenin' is easy. Rather, it will be tomorrow night, when the TD Canada Trust Toronto Jazz Festival kicks off its 20th anniversary.

Among the host of acts, big name and small, to be presented at the festival, which runs until July 1, are a few local Jewish jazz sensations, notably young vocalist Sophia Perlman and Juno award-winning jazz violinist Lenny Solomon.

Perlman, an up-and-coming jazz chanteuse (she turns 22 this July), has been honing her vocal chops around town with a few different outfits. But her staple gig is with her eight-piece band, The Vipers.

Perlman's rich, throaty voice, which sounds like its been refined for decades, leads The Vipers through jazz tunes from across all eras.

"I've been singing jazz for about four years," she said. "I studied it at Humber College. Before that, I studied classically with the Canadian Children's Opera Chorus."

Perlman said she was excited about this year's fest, as she'll not only play a gig with The Vipers but will also be singing in what's being billed as the Sophia Perlman Trio.

"I'm so used to playing with larger ensembles like The Vipers," she said. "But with the trio, it's really nice to get the opportunity to play with smaller groups in a more intimate setting."

In preparation, she's "singing as much as I can and trying to wrap my brain around some new repertoire."

On Monday, The Vipers released their debut CD, Once Smitten.

Perlman sings with The Vipers at the Reservoir Lounge, 52 Wellington St. E., 416-955-0887 at 9:30 p.m. on June 25, and then performs in her new trio at the Ten Feet Tall club, 1381 Danforth Ave., 416-778-7333 at 3:30 p.m.

And if you ever wanted to hear it straight from a jazzman's mouth, then you can catch Solomon as he holds a talk-back session at Nathan Phillips Square on June 24.

A prelude to this year's performance by innovative jazz violinist Jean-Luc Ponty, Solomon is expected to talk about Ponty's influence on the genre, as well as his own years and experiences in jazz and swing.

Solomon's talent has been compared to some of the great jazz violinists of our times, namely Stéphane Grapelli and Joe Venuti.

"It's a great honour. I have emulated [them] on record. They've been an inspiration to me… as well as a local inspiration of mine, [Toronto jazz violinist] Harvey Tishkoff," Solomon said.

Though not performing at this year's festival, Solomon, now in his 50s, remains busy with his successful touring production, Bowfire, a violin and fiddle extravaganza.

"It's an incredible group of 10 violinists of all different styles… klezmer, gypsy, classical, Celtic, bluegrass, Texas-swing, Chinese erhu… it's a real theatrical presentation of all things violin," Solomon said.

He recently finished recording a DVD of the show, which will be broadcast on PBS in December.

But he lamented the fact he has little time to record new material, his last album being 2004's Transparency.

"Bowfire is an all-consuming type of thing. I would love to carve out some time to do some more recording and play more jazz with a small group," he said. "But it's difficult for me to organize another project right now."

Also scheduled to perform on the eve of this year's fest is 13-year-old Montreal jazz-singing phenom Nikki Yanofsky. She is the opening act for the Steve Koven Trio on June 21 at Live@Courthouse, 57 Adelaide St. E., 416-214-9379.

CHAT baseball teams play friendly game at Rogers Centre

By ELI SHUPAK
Special to The CJN

Years from now, the 2007 Anne and Max Tanenbaum Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto (CHAT) baseball teams, north and south campuses, won't recall many of the details from their recent exhibition game at the Rogers Centre. What they'll treasure are the memories and the experiences they had playing on a major-league baseball diamond.

Through a program sponsored by the Toronto Blue Jays, local area high schools are able to play a game at the Rogers Centre free of charge, provided that they sell $10,000 worth of Blue Jays tickets. This was the third time that the two CHAT campuses have met at the dome since the initiative was introduced in 2004.

"It's always a great experience to come out here and have some fun," said Jamie Wang, shortstop of the north campus Cougars, who was playing for the third and final time against the south campus Tigers.

The Cougars prevailed 12-11 on this occasion after rallying for four runs in the top of the eighth inning. They took the lead – and school bragging rights – on senior Matty Benaim's two-run double down the third-base line with two outs in their last at bat.

David Freiman had three hits and a couple of stolen bases for the Tigers, which helped his club get a 7-1 lead through five innings. The Tigers, who are 2006 Toronto District Colleges Athletic Association (TDCAA) tier two baseball champions, won the 2007 title a few days after the Rogers Centre event, defeating Dante Alighiere Academy 7-5 in extra innings.

"It was a lot of fun to play out here. We don't get to do it a whole lot," the Tigers' 10th grader said.

Coach Jory Vernon, who's been coaching the Tigers for seven years, said the game between the two CHAT campuses is a friendly affair. Many players played out of position, with everyone just wanting to have a good time.

"It's a natural thing that we play each other," he said. "Our motto is, one school, two campuses. A lot of the kids know each other from camp and [the game is] a good promotion."

Vernon presented Freiman and the rest of his teammates with baseballs signed by Blue Jays relief pitcher B.J. Ryan after the game.

CHAT teams enjoy a day at the Rogers Centre

The Blue Jays stopper was scheduled to meet and greet the kids, but was out of town due to season-ending elbow surgery.

The two teams exceeded their $10,000 quota by selling 377 tickets to a Blue Jays-New York Yankees game at a group rate of $35 apiece, for a $13,195 total.

"We ended up with enough to satisfy the Jays, enough to buy our team Blue Jays hats, and enough to give to charity," said Vernon. "Win, win, win."

CHAT was planning to donate about $1,000 to Jewish Family & Child Service to allow kids the opportunity to take in a ball game.

Josh Hill and Harris Wade of the Cougars were recognized prior to the game for their outstanding contribution to school sports. Hill made a phenomenal catch in the fifth game of the year, but he collided with the centrefielder in the process, suffering a season-ending injury as he shattered his orbital bone and required six hours of surgery. Wade competed at the Special Olympics as a swimmer.

Miami lawyer named president of Israel Baseball League

NEW YORK — Miami-based trial lawyer Martin Berger has been named president and chief operating officer (COO) of the Israel Baseball League (IBL).

The announcement was made by IBL founder and managing director Larry Baras.

"As president and COO, he will take responsibility for the ultimate sale of our individual franchises and oversee the business operations of the league. We place the IBL in good hands with his expertise and his knowledge," Baras said.

Dan Duquette, the league's director of baseball operations and the former general manager of the Boston Red Sox and the Montreal Expos, ran six tryout camps to stock the six IBL teams with 120 players. Eight nations are represented on the team rosters and Berger was a key participant in running the draft and preparing scouting reports on the players.

"Martin has not only worked side by side with Dan Duquette in running tryouts and stocking the rosters, but has been a vital player for us in crafting our agreements and getting us on track for our June 24 opening day," Baras said.

Berger, 40, has spent his entire legal career counselling corporations as well as individuals in complex commercial and personal injury litigation. He has received numerous awards for his pro bono legal work on behalf of disadvantaged children and in 2002 was chosen as the guardian of the year for the Put Something Back program of the Miami-Dade County Circuit Court.

Berger is committed to Jewish causes and takes an active role in his local synagogue, Jewish day school and at the University of Miami Hillel. He is a graduate of the University of Chicago, where he earned his bachelor's degree in economics, and is a George Washington University School of Law graduate. He will spend the majority of the eight-week season in Israel as the IBL becomes the first professional baseball league in the Middle East.

"Larry Baras and Commissioner [Daniel] Kurtzer have asked me to help them take this league to the next level and I look forward to that task," said Berger. "With the help and guidance of Dan Duquette, Marvin Goldklang and Andrew Zimbalist, the founders of the IBL have laid the groundwork for the IBL to fast become the destination baseball league in Europe. I hope I am up to the task and I look forward to working with all of these esteemed individuals. It is truly an honour."

The IBL will have six teams competing for the first championship: the Bet Shemesh Blue Sox, the Modi'in Miracle, the Netanya Tigers, the Petach Tikva Pioneers, the Ra'anana Express and the Tel Aviv Lightning.

My life in dog years

Almost Famous
By Jacob Medjuck

When I was growing up and our neighbour's dog turned eight, I was told that he was 45 in "dog years." At first I thought this was a joke, but in time I came to understand that the pup, though half my age, had geriatric tendencies.

Last year, my father rappelled down the side of a skyscraper. He biked for seven days from the top of Israel to the bottom. He studies karate weekly and plays basketball daily. He even has a college trainer helping to sharpen his game.

If you should find yourself defending against him, here's some advice: make no attempt to steal the ball. He is tall and slippery, so you will inevitably slide off his soaked torso like eggs on Teflon. Not only will you feel gross, but he will jab you sharply with his elbow to remind you that it was dumb to try.

All of this is to say that on the brink of receiving his pension, my father is still youthful, sharp, sassy and spry.

So when he called to complain about his birthday this year, I was surprised.

"I'm 63." He said on the phone. "Sixty-three."

"Sixty-three," I said. "You're young."

"No," he replied. "It's disconcerting."

He explained: "If you had a son tomorrow, I would be 76 at the bar mitzvah. Seventy-six! But you can't have a son tomorrow. It takes nine months to bear children – and you don't even have a girlfriend!

"Let's say instead that you just met the girl tonight, which means I'm 77 or 78 at the bar mitzvah. But let's say she's not the right one – or you're not the right one, which is more likely, Jacob. So let's say you finally find the right girl in two years, now I'm 79 or 80 at the bar mitzvah.

"And let's say you want to travel for a year and have kids later – I'm 81, 82. And when you finally do get pregnant… It's a girl!! Eighty-three, 84, and you're on to you're second kid – 85. I'm 85 at the bar mitzvah!

"And that's if you get it all right – which you've never done. I'm 85 if it all goes perfectly! What goes perfectly? Nothing.

"So here's the new plan: Do you remember when we told you to find a girl who loves you? The right girl for you? A woman who will take care of you and who will let you take care of her? Someone fun – all that good stuff? Forget that.

"Go find anyone. Tonight even. Your mother and I have put aside some money, and we will take care of everything. Make a baby – make a boy, make two, and with luck, I will be at the bar mitzvah."

He breathes for the first time in minutes.

I digest. He hangs up.

I get a call a week later. "Your sister's having a baby," he tells me. "If it's a boy, you're off the hook."

Fortunately for us all, my nephew Noam was born shortly thereafter.

I would still like to have my parents at the bar and bat mitzvahs of my own children. But I would be happy enough at this stage to get a second date.

To that effect, I bought a book about relationships last summer, and the test I took from it scored me emotionally as "88 per cent child."

I feel I've matured some since then, but if it remains the case that a dog at eight is 45, and that my father at 63 is 85, then according to the Oprah book club, the next family bar mitzvah that my father might attend would be my second.

If so, this time I'm registering at Future Shop. Mazel tovs and DVDs, please.

BLUE CHEESE STUFFED MUSHROOMS WITH GRILLED ONIONS

1 lb. fresh mushrooms, stems removed
8 oz. blue cheese
3 medium onions, sliced into rings
1/4 cup olive oil

Preheat an outdoor grill for high heat, and lightly oil grate. Fill mushroom caps with crumbled blue cheese.

Place onion slices and mushrooms (cheese side up) onto the prepared grill. Turn onions over frequently until tender. Do not turn over mushrooms. Grill until blue cheese has melted, and mushrooms are tender. Remove mushrooms to a serving plate, and top with grilled onions.

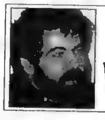
Imagining the imagination

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER



I am deeply intrigued by the imagination, because the fertility of ideas that stem from people's minds gives much insight into the human condition and educates others about the nuances of life.

As an example, Arthur Rubinstein, widely considered as one of the greatest piano virtuosos of the 20th century, once said, "I cannot tell you how much I love to play for people. Would you believe it – sometimes when I sit down to practise and there is no one else in the room, I have to stifle an impulse to ring for the elevator man and offer him money to come in and hear me."

How delightful! Upon reading this quote, I imagined a giddy senior sitting down at his grand piano, throwing out his coattales and giggling at the notion of inviting up the elevator man – perhaps a personable, aging novelist with the rich sort of wisdom that working men have. I learned from this quote that the greats can be childlike in nature; that they are frequently driven by ego nourishment; and that elevator men in expensive buildings likely lead absorbing lives.

I spent a recent Thursday night with a friend who told me a story about his 14-year-old son. The teen had met a middle-aged man who was able to recite page after page of the Talmud by heart. The man asked my friend's son what he was learning. The boy replied Tractate Makot, whereby the scholar recited the first paragraph verbatim.

Afterward, the young man told his dad, "A person who remembers well now will have a hard old age, because he will start forgetting things."

How insightful! I then considered what clarity my buddy's son must have into human nature to appreciate the man's gift of a good memory and understand how devastating the loss of it will be – all of this at 14.

For many years, I have conducted religious services at a home for the aged. Within its walls is a woman who is 104. She will often beckon me to her side, cup her hand to the right side of her mouth and pretend to whisper, "I'm going to tell you something that even the malach hamavet [angel of death] doesn't know… I am 104 years old."

Now that's humorously holy, is it not? I am so enthralled by her every word, imagining what this woman has seen, heard, tasted and smelled, and I marvel at how vast her experiences must have been to give such indomitable strength to her words.

Consider what it must be like to be one of the oldest people in the world. It must be like being the tallest person in the room, able to see what others cannot.

And then there is my friend Paul, the carpenter, whom I told you about a couple of months back. Paul loves a good wine. He also loves wood and says he has a relationship with it.

Paul is spellbound by life. Recently he told me that when he was a kid, there was nothing better than wearing his brother's hand-me-down jeans. Not having an older brother, I asked him to explain. He said, "My brother protected me in school. He was larger than life, and wearing his clothes – despite the fact it really meant our family had limited means – was a badge of honour."

Very nice. I imagined myself in a big brother's jeans. It felt safe. Even envisioning such a relationship made me feel like I was out of harm's way.

Albert Einstein said, "Imagination is more important than knowledge." Albert would know; he had much of both.

A pianist, a Torah scholar, 104-year-old women and an older brother. We could spend a lifetime ruminating on their insights alone. Oy! Such pleasure.

Canada dissents in UN attack on Israel

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

Over Canada's objections, the United Nations Human Rights Council adopted by "consensus" a number of measures critics say unfairly target Israel and make condemnation of the Jewish state a permanent feature of every future council meeting.

The measures will see Israel's "human rights violations" placed on the agenda at all future council meetings – no other country is so treated – and will make permanent a special rapporteur to investigate Israeli human rights abuses. Ten other special rapporteurs have mandates that lapse and must be renewed.

The measures were part of a reform package that is meant to set out the mechanisms and procedures that will govern operation of the council, which was established a year ago to replace a largely discredited Commission on Human Rights.

Peter McKay

The Human Rights Council announced it had adopted the measures by consensus, but Canada objected to that interpretation, saying they had not been approved when the council adjourned the night before and Canada would want to express its opposition in a vote.

The incoming council president, Luis Alfonso de Alba, rejected Canada's view and called for a vote of council members. By a 46-1 vote, they supported his position that the measures had already been adopted by consensus. Canada registered the only vote against.

The procedural irregularity prompted a strongly worded response from the Canadian representative at the council. Perry Cormier said he wished "to challenge" the interpretation that consensus was reached on the reform package. He noted the council's president adjourned proceedings with no firm decision taken and had said the council would take action on them the following day.

"This did not and could not constitute adoption of the package under discussion as Canada never agreed to it and had expressed its concerns to this effect. In fact, Canada had not even seen the final version of the text until the end of the session, and the draft resolution… has only been circulated today.

Hamas plays tape of kidnapped soldier

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

GAZA CITY — In a message released to coincide with the first anniversary of the kidnapping of Cpl. Gilad Shalit, a voice identified on a Hamas website as that of the Israel Defence Forces corporal said Monday that he was disappointed about the Israeli government's lack of interest in his fate.

The message also said that Shalit's health was deteriorating and that he would need to be hospitalized for a long period of time.

"I'm sorry for the lack of interest the government has in me," the message said in part. It could not be immediately confirmed that the recording was of Shalit, but his father Noam indicated that the voice – if not the wording of the message – was that of the abducted soldier.

This is the first time Shalit's voice has been heard since his kidnapping a year ago.

"I am Gilad, son of Noam Shalit," the message began. "Mom and Dad, brother and sister, my friends in the IDF – I send my love and miss you all dearly. It has been a year since I was captured, and my health is deteriorating. I am in need of prolonged hospitalization.

"I am sorry for the Israeli government's and IDF's lack of interest in me and their rej

Ottawa Walks

OTTAWA — The Jewish Federation of Ottawa raised $55,000 from its Walkathon earlier this month. Some 300 participants came out for the nine-kilometre walk on June 3, which was launched by Israeli Ambassador Alan Baker. The annual event had been on hiatus for a year.

Attack Condemned

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress condemned the hate graffiti found June 21 on the cultural centre of the Kitigan Zibi Anishinabeg Algonquin First Nations 130 kilometres north of Ottawa. The building was marred with spray-painted swastikas, the words "white power" and SS lightning bolts. "The fact that the perpetrators of this hateful act chose to employ Nazi imagery acts to underline an important reality: those who hate do so indiscriminately. They attack all of us when they attack anyone," said CJC co-President Rabbi Reuven Bulka.

Longtime MP Resigns

TORONTO — Willowdale MP Jim Peterson, a former trade minister who was first elected in 1980 and has won six straight elections since 1988, said last week he'll retire July 12. Peterson, 65, had said he would not seek re-election, but decided to leave early because the next election could be as late as 2009. Former leadership candidate Martha Hall Findlay will be the Liberal candidate in his riding, which has a large Jewish population.

Imam Visits Temple

CALGARY — Imam Reda Bedeir of the Calgary Islamic Centre addressed Calgary's Temple B'nai Tikvah June 15 as part of the shul's regular Friday night services. He was invited by spiritual leader Rabbi Howard Voss-Altman. Imam Bedeir said violence in Muslim countries often leads people to question Islam's message of tolerance. "But we must remember to differentiate between the faith and the followers," the Calgary Herald quoted him as saying. "Muslims are human beings like everyone else, and there are good and bad people involved in all religions."

Fine Paid in Web Case

MONTREAL — An 18-year-old man has been fined $210 for distributing information about websites that may be anti-Semitic to homes in Dorval and Pointe Claire, Que., where he lives. Police fined him for not having a permit to deliver material door to door. They were investigating the websites to determine if he should also be charged with a hate crime. The business-card-sized handouts contained addresses of six websites that B'nai Brith said are anti-Semitic, including www.jewwatch.com, run by white-supremacist Frank Weltner of St. Louis, Mo. In publicizing the case, B'nai Brith repeated its longstanding demand for the creation of a specialized hate-crimes unit within the Montreal police force. The man distributed the leaflets in late May and earlier this month.

Rabbi to Head Organ Donation Agency

OTTAWA — Rabbi Reuven Bulka of Ottawa has been named chair of the board of the Trillium Gift of Life Network (TLGN), Ontario's organ and tissue donation agency.

The appointment came the same week as Rabbi Bulka, spiritual leader of Ottawa's Congregation Machzikei Hadas, was acclaimed as the co-president, along with Sylvain Abitbol, of Canadian Jewish Congress at its 28th Plenary Assembly in Ottawa.

Rabbi Reuven Bulka

Rabbi Bulka has been on the TLGN board since 2004. His term runs until Nov. 30, 2008.

"Rabbi Bulka is a terrific leader and has a tremendous presence in the organ and tissue donation community," said Frank Markel, president of TLGN, the government agency that promotes and co-ordinates organ and tissue donation.

Museum Planned

ANCHORAGE — A museum dedicated to the history of the Jews of Alaska will be built. The announcement was made this month in Anchorage. Chicago philanthropist Rabbi Morris Esformes will fund the bulk of the project, which will include a museum and community centre, and a Lubavitch centre. The museum will chronicle the story of Jews in Alaska from the Gold Rush days of the mid-19th century, to their role in the purchase of Alaska from Russia, to the story of Alaskan Jewry's connection to the airlift of 40,000 Yemenite Jews to Israel in 1948. Plans for the museum began in 2004. Fundraising has raised $250,000 a year for the past three years, and Alaska has approved a grant of $850,000. No completion date has been set.

Privilege Revoked

ROME — The convicted Nazi who was allowed to work as a translator and clerk in his lawyer's office had that right suspended. An Italian military judge revoked a permit allowing Erich Priebke, 93, to work outside his home until "a competent judge takes a decision on the basics of the case," the European Jewish Press reported. The judge said Priebke's lawyers did not clearly say how and when he would travel from his home, where he is under house arrest. Priebke was convicted in 1997 for his role in a 1944 massacre outside Rome that killed 335 civilians. About 100 Jews protested when he arrived at work June 18.

Petition Signed

GENEVA — A group of 104 legislators from Switzerland's major political parties has signed a petition urging the Swiss Federal Council in Bern to take stronger action to address attacks against Jews, synagogues and Jewish cemeteries in Switzerland after a May 24 shul fire in Geneva. The police probe into the arson

Brosh departs as consul-general after four years

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

It's getting close to moving time at the Israeli consulate on Bloor Street.

Come mid-August, Consul General Ya'acov Brosh and Trade Commissioner Ephraim Shoham will pack their bags and bid farewell to Toronto after four-year sojourns here.

Will be replaced by Amir Gissin

Both are returning to Israel as part of a normal rotation of consular officials. Brosh will be replaced by Amir Gissin, head of the Foreign Ministry's public affairs department, and Shoham will be succeeded by Yonathan Levy.

In an interview at his downtown Toronto office, Brosh expressed gratitude to the Jewish community for making his family's stay here pleasant and eventful. Toronto, he said, is considered a plum assignment in the Israeli foreign service. It's known for its welcoming Jewish community, its "positive atmosphere" and friendly relations with Israel, and for "its reputation as a very pleasant place to live in," he said.

As part of his duties – which included responsibilities for Western Canada – Brosh travelled the length and breadth of the country.

Fresh from a visit to the Grand Rapids First Nations Reserve in Manitoba, Brosh said developing good relations with Canada's aboriginal people was part of his agenda as consul general.

Ya'acov Brosh

Working in partnership with the government of Manitoba and with the co-operation of the Jewish National Fund (JNF), Israel is backing the construction of money-generating greenhouses on the Cree reserve.

The project will see the adaptation of Israeli technology to rural Manitoba and hopefully improve the prospects of the local Cree population, Brosh said.

In addition, the JNF has agreements with the governments of Manitoba and Alberta to employ Israeli water management techniques, and Manitoba will send a master's-level student to Israel's Technion Institute next year to study water management, he said.

Israel's relations with Manitoba go on in other areas, he continued. Manitoba's justice minister, David Chomiak, sent a delegation from the province's youth corrections system to study Israel's techniques for addressing youth crime. Brosh expects a team of Israeli experts to one day reciprocate the visit.

Brosh arrived in Toronto after heading the Jordan, Syria and Lebanon department at Israel's foreign ministry.

Before that, he served for eight years in Egypt.

"When I came to Toronto, it was not just a new place, but a new kind of work," he said.

While the embassy in Ottawa generally focuses on political engagement with Canadian lawmakers, Brosh focused on culture, youth exchanges, information, trade, sending delegations to Israel and working with provincial and other local governments.

Unlike his experience in the Arab world, he found a friendly and receptive country to deal with and a "strong and supportive Jewish community."

"All this was a refreshing and nice change," he said.

Brosh arrived in Toronto with "a general" agenda, and "I followed it the last four years."

Its key point was to strengthen the substantive relations between Canada and Israel by creating mutually beneficial points of contact – such as the reserve greenhouses – and, generally, to "expose Canadians to the real face of Israel."

Voice, song, prayer, soul

From the editor's desk

I have known Cantor Louis Danto for nearly 28 years. He sings in public less now than he used to. He also walks more slowly than he used to. But he smiles as ever with the same delicate twinkle in his blue grey eyes. And he carries himself with the same solemn dignity that caught the eye of the still young Queen Elizabeth when he sang for her almost 25 years ago at Maple Leaf Gardens in 1984.

But though he sings less these days, there is a significant discography of Danto's recordings, thanks in no small part to the devotion and energies of his wife, Ruchama.

Danto is a legend among cantors, a master shaliach tzibur, people's emissary in prayer. But he is also a master student, teacher and devoté of the art of song. His voice carries the tune, but his soul brings forth the music.

It was my great pleasure on a recent uncluttered afternoon, when my mind wandered to old photographs in old photo albums, and the sky was high and deep blue and the breeze barely a touch against the cheek, to hear Danto sing again.

I listened to the four-CD set of Musical Moments with Cantor Louis Danto, 50 Years of Musical Treasures and marvelled once again, as I had so often in the past, at the man's ability to evoke, in responsive resonance with his music, such strong feelings and emotions in the listener.

The phrase bel canto is a broadly-defined term that generally means refined, beautiful, dextrous singing. It has always been applied to the unique vocal style of Danto.

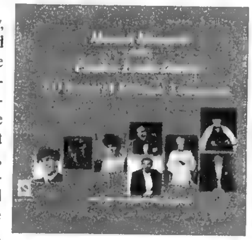
His voice cries with a distinct high register imploring of all the forces in heaven. It seems to emanate from the upper portion of his body and not, as is usually the case with accomplished professional singers, from the more muscular middle portion. His is a tender tenor.

After some 30 years as the cantor of the Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue in Toronto, he is now the emeritus there.

Danto's life and his music began more than seven decades ago in the Polish town of Suwalki. He was a child prodigy, whose remarkable talents were recognized by his parents. He was sent away to study in some of the best musical academies in Europe. He was away from home when the Nazis rolled in and forever altered the course of his life and that of his people.

This four-CD set contains 74 selections that span 50 years of Danto's singing career. The first CD offers samplings of his music from the synagogue; the second is of Hebrew and some liturgical selections; the third only Yiddish songs and the fourth CD consists of classical Italian, French, German and Russian selections.

The wide diversity of the selections is stunning. His versatility and completely evident comfort with wide-ranging material confirm the profound depth of his talent.



Danto's first loyalty, if the word can be used in this context, is to the music itself, to the exacting demand of faithfully recreating the sound of the notes that the composer intended, to sheer technical precision, to the starts and stops of the delicate phrases, to the flawless, seamless meshing of pitch, breath and melody.

One of the chief hallmarks of Danto's singing is his tightly controlled delivery of the music and the composer's message. From the operatic offerings, one need merely listen to his prayerful renditions of Cilea's Il Lamento de Federico or Bizet's Mi Par Dudir Ancora, both recorded in 1954, to delight in the nuanced splendour and grace of Danto's voice. He understands the meaning in the words. And he is so often able to find that near metaphysical wave of personal connection from which he spins out what is probably closest to the richer meaning of the music.

When he sings in Yiddish, of course, he returns to the home in which he was raised. Thus, we hear him sing Rozhinkes Mit Mandlen with the poignant ache and exquisite caring of a parent looking at his sleeping, young child,

In the Hebrew folksong Boi Na Roati, his voice virtually replicates the sound of a beckoning shepherd's lute whose lonely notes we can imagine wafting through the desert night air.

Danto's rendition of Glantz's Shma Yisrael is a hauntingly powerful assertion of God's Oneness. At times, it is as if we are listening to the sound of the wind coursing through the rock-hewn crevices of the holy mountain of Sinai.

And when he chants Keil Ma'ale Rachamim, the traditional memorial prayer, our hearts break.

After a performance many years ago at Carnegie Hall, the New York Times music critic Alan Rich wrote of Louis Danto that he had "a voice of great beauty, clear and true – breathtaking, radiant, as though from another world."

Rich wrote well and perceptively.

It has been the echo of a soul that, though forged through the fires of the Shoah, nevertheless nurtured a pure love of music and the magic it can elicit. The countless thousands of us who have had the good fortune over the years, to hear Danto sing have often travelled with him to that "other" world and felt the restorative caress of a moment of memory conveyed in teary, soft refrain in the minor key. And we have felt enfolded, too, in the love that pours from the prayers, the songs and the music that have been the inspiring story of his life.

Israel should back Fatah gov't: Israeli analyst

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Israel should support the new emergency government in the West Bank headed by Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, an Israeli analyst said last week.

In a telephone briefing for the Jewish press organized by the New York-based Conference of Presidents of Major American Jewish organizations, Mideast commentator Ehud Yaari said Israel should assist Abbas in establishing a stable government now that Hamas has seized the Gaza Strip and the short-lived Palestinian unity government has been dissolved.

"They need a lot of babysitting," said Yaari in a reference to Abbas' newly formed Fatah government. "Israel has to make sure that Abbas is strengthened."

As he spoke, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert announced that Israel would funnel previously withheld Palestinian tax revenues to Abbas, while the United States and the European Union promised to resume direct financial assistance to the Palestinian Authority.

Yaari – a Channel 2 pundit of Arab and Palestinian affairs and a columnist for the Jerusalem Report magazine – urged Abbas not to deploy the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade, a Fatah armed faction that has staged suicide attacks in Israel, to hunt down Hamas activists in the West Bank.

Condemning the Al Aqsa Martyrs Brigade as "hooligans," Yaari said its fighters have blood on their hands.

Yaari added that while the Israeli government should continue to boycott Hamas – which defeated Fatah in parliamentary elections in January 2006 – Israel should consider signing an internationally monitored armistice agreement with Hamas.

He warned that Hamas may launch a third Palestinian uprising and resume Qassam missile attacks against Israel, if international sanctions aren't lifted in the next few months.

If there is a resumption of Hamas shelling, Israel's military response will be harsher than before, he said.

He added that Israel's new defence minister, former prime minister Ehud Barak, holds this belief.

In an analysis of recent developments in Palestinian politics, Yaari said Fatah, retaliating for its severe losses in Gaza, is currently in the midst of removing Hamas influence in the West Bank.

Fatah received U.S. arms through Egypt, but didn't offer real resistance to Hamas in five days of bitter fighting, he observed in a scathing appraisal of its abilities.

Fatah's commander in Gaza, Mohammed Dahlan, was not even on hand as street battles flared, Yaari noted, saying that he moved to "a nice villa" in the West Bank long ago.

Yaari described Hamas' victory as the first military coup in the Arab world in more than three decades and "the first Islamic takeover of an Arab country."

Pointing a finger at Iran, Yaari said that the Iranian regime supported Hamas with advice, funds and weapons.

He said that Hamas captured Fatah's intelligence files dating back to the 1970s. "Iran and Syria are extremely eager to know what will be found there."

Looking ahead, Yaari predicted that Fatah and Hamas will attempt to unite the Palestinians by resurrecting the unity government. For now, Fatah will try to regain influence in Gaza through the payment of salaries to government workers.

Fatah commands immense financial resources now that the United States and the European Union have lifted their restrictions on the Palestinians.

With external help, Abbas will attempt to turn the West Bank into a model of Palestinian statehood. But Yaari suspects that Hamas will offer better governance than Fatah.

In the meantime, Hamas may unleash terrorist attacks in the West Bank to undermine Prime Minister Salam Fayyad's Fatah government. Fayyad, a banker, was finance minister in the old Palestinian unity government.

Yaari praised Fayyad as "a good man" who performed well in his previous position, but he pointed out that Fayyad labours under two disadvantages: he has neither a power base nor troops on the ground.

Yaari said that Israel cannot starve Gaza by withholding water or electricity. But Israel should devise viable border crossing arrangements in co-ordination with Egypt.

JF&CS adopts new logo, motto

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN

Jewish Family & Child Service's new logo and slogan illustrate the agency's ability to support clients throughout their lives, says executive director Richard Cummings.

Now known as Jewish Family and Child, the organization has adopted "Every Step of the Way" as its motto, "because our commitment is to hang in there with you through that span," Cummings said last week at the agency's annual general meeting, held at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

As a multi-service organization, he said, Jewish Family and Child has a range of services for people in all stages of life.

Guest speaker Marla Shapiro, a physician, television personality, author and columnist, said the agency's new slogan is appropriate, because "we aren't always masters along the road [of life.] Jewish Family and Child focuses on integrating all individuals [into the community.]"

A large number of people would be unable to thrive without community support, she said.

"Children from poor families have more difficulty sleeping and suffer from more sleep disorders [than other children.] This leads to impaired cognitive skills, and they may [go on] to become socially, economically and financially impaired."

New mothers suffering from post-partum depression also need community support, Shapiro said. "While doctors concentrate on the baby's milestones, only those who read studies [on the disorder] learn to ask how the mother is. Children [of these mothers] suffer from poor bonding."

It's often difficult for people to ask for help, or even realize that they need help, she said.

"The challenge is to teach people to teach themselves. Jewish Family and Child helps people identify that they need [some,help."]

Stress, Shapiro said, costs the Canadian government $12 billion a year, and doctors can't diagnose it the way they diagnose cholesterol or diabetes.

"Stress is a self-perception that translates into such things as heart attack and stroke. It can take a system already at risk, lower its immune system, and push it over the edge."

There is a ripple effect that occurs when people are unhealthy, and it eventually translates into the disability of an entire community, Shapiro said.

We can only become empowered by knowledge, she said.

"Not all of us have a board of directors in our life to whom we can go for support. [Sometimes people have to know when to ask for help.]"

The meeting also paid tribute to Gordy Wolfe, the agency's longtime executive director who died in April, and S. Richard Orzy replaced David Peltz as president of the agency's board of directors.

Schools, soldiers salute Jerusalem

Israeli soldiers and 250 students from seven Toronto Jewish day schools celebrated the 40th anniversary of Jerusalem's reunification with a concert.

The students performed Israeli songs for an audience of 900 on June 14 at Beth Tzedec Congregation.

The Jewish National Fund's (JNF) national education emissary, Aviva Reifler, said she came up with the event as a way to both honour Jerusalem and connect Toronto students.

"Jerusalem is a uniting theme for every Jew, certainly for the Jewish schools, certainly for the Jewish schools' students," said the concert's co-producer Ronit Eisenman.

"We were very fortunate that so many schools wanted to participate."

Eisenman said the last event that incorporated so many day schools was to honour Israel's 40th birthday at Ontario Place in 1988.

The event featured a musical performance by a group of Israeli soldiers on a 12-day Canadian tour. Dubbed the "Singing Soldiers," sergeants Lev, Erez, Adam, Hadar and Maya serve in the Israeli Defence Forces' medical and logistics corp (the IDF would only give their first names for security reasons).

The group performed seven numbers and got the enthusiastic children dancing and singing on stage.

"The children were amazing. They sang all the songs and they speak wonderful Hebrew," said Lev, who plays percussion.

The group, accompanied by sound technician Cpl. Or and their leader Maj. Noa, came to Canada on a 12-day tour. They performed three times in Winnipeg, including at the city's 2007 Negev Gala, and four times in Toronto, including as headliners at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue.

Lev, who was born in Canada but has lived in Israel since age six, said he was pleasantly surprised to see the vibrancy and strength of Canada's Jewish community.

Reifler said JNF wanted to bring the soldiers to Canada because they are a perfect symbol of Jerusalem.

Participant school choirs included United Synagogue Day School, Netivot HaTorah Day School, Bialik Hebrew Day School, Leo Baeck Day School, Associated Hebrew Schools, Montessori Jewish Day School and the Toronto Heschel School.

Speakers included Israeli Consul General Ya'acov Brosh and JNF world chairman Efi Stenzler.

Reifler said she was so pleased with the event that she plans to create more co-operative events for schools around themes such as Zionism or the environment.

"We have such a strong community here and such a wonderful education system," Eisenman said. "We should involve everybody in many more events, because it enriches both the individuals and the community."

Mourn for the hope that was stillborn

In an effort to retool and refashion the standing body that examines the condition of human rights around the world, the United Nations last year created the UN Human Rights Council. Born of a determination to protect the globe's neediest and most vulnerable, the newly established body, based in Geneva, ended the perverse, cynical, mischievous manipulation of the human rights agenda.

Or so it was hoped.

But after a year of operation, the new body, alas, is but a reincarnated runt of its malign predecessor. What was old and contemptible is new again, but still, no less contemptible.

Last week, the council agreed to adopt rules of procedure that marked only one country on earth for special scrutiny. Israel will now become a permanent item on the council's agenda. The vote was 46 in favour, one opposed. The sole voice objecting to the decision was that of Canada. The other members of the regional grouping in which Canada voted (Western Europe and Others) were Finland, France, Germany, the Netherlands, Switzerland and the United Kingdom.

"In establishing the council," its Canadian representative Perry Cormier said, "the General Assembly set out its guiding principles. These include universality, impartiality, objectivity and non-selectivity. Canada therefore regrets the inclusion in the proposed agenda of the council of an item that singles out one situation for politicized, selective, partial and subjective treatment. The proposed agenda item on Palestine and the occupied Arab territories is not consistent with the founding principles of the council. If this council is to be credible and effective, we must hold it to standards set out by the General Assembly."

The council also voted to extend the mandate of the special rapporteur on the human rights of the Palestinians "until the end of the occupation," the only such open-ended mandate.

By failing to deal with actual, ongoing abuses of human rights, such as those in Darfur, Zimbabwe, China and North Korea, and once again singling out the Jewish state for discriminatory, highly prejudicial treatment, the council has indeed now lost the ability to be credible and effective, just as the Canadian spokesperson pointed out.

"Today is a terrible day for human rights. It's a terrible day for the United Nations," said Hillel Neuer last week, the executive director of the watchdog, non-governmental organization, UN Watch.

The foreign ministry of Israel expressed "its appreciation to Canada, the only council member to take a clear, unambiguous position and oppose the decision."

We commend the government for its principled vote even as we mourn for the hope of true human rights protection that was stillborn one year ago in Geneva.

25 years ago in The CJN

In discussions described as blunt, frank and direct, Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin and U.S. president Ronald Reagan agreed that all foreign troops should be withdrawn from Lebanon, that violence against Israel must stop, and that Lebanon is entitled to a strong central government. The Canadian government called for the withdrawal of Israeli troops.

Arab states should subdue Hamas

The sheer brutality of masked Hamas gunmen confirms and justifies Canada's decision to be the first country to cut off aid when Hamas won the election in the Palestinian Territories. Hamas has never renounced terrorism and is still committed to the destruction of the State of Israel. No reasonable person can or should suggest that Israel should negotiate with such an uncivilized bunch of thugs. By its actions in Gaza, Hamas will have lost the support not only of some western governments but also the members of the Arab League, other than Syria and Iran. The ultimate fear for the region is that the rhetoric of Hamas will fuel violence in Palestinian camps, such as is already occurring in Lebanon, and will spread to camps in Syria and Jordan. It is incumbent on Arab states such as Egypt and Jordan, for their own security and stability, to intervene, if necessary militarily, to subdue Hamas and to bring peace to Gaza and the West Bank.

Israelis want no more withdrawals

Sheldon Kirshner in his column "Reflections on the Six Day War" (CJN, June 7) writes that Israelis have recently had second thoughts about the wisdom of clinging to the West Bank, having realized that keeping these territories is bound to block prospects for a rapprochement with the Palestinian Arabs. However, according to a recent Knesset Channel and Dahaf Institute poll, a majority of Israelis want no more withdrawals from parts of the Land of Israel. Fifty-three per cent were against giving back the West Bank, 68 per cent were against giving back the Golan Heights and 86 per cent were against giving back the Western Wall. It seems that the recent rocket attacks on Sderot have hardened people's attitudes and shown the fallacy of giving back land to the Palestinian Arabs, who only use that land as a terrorist base for further attacks on Israel.

Unite around day school funding

It was telling to read in "Education funding set to become Ont. election issue," (CJN, June 21) about the reaction to the Liberal government to Conservative leader John Tory's recently announced plan to bring faith-based schools under the rubric of public education. Education Minister Kathleen Wynne could find nothing good to say about the plan and looked for every reason to poke holes in it. The Liberals' senior media advisor, Ben Chin, raised the oft repeated canard that this plan would divide society into "religious enclaves" – something that is not borne out by the reality in any other jurisdiction that funds faith-based schools fairly. While it is true that members of the Jewish community of Ontario are spread throughout the entire political spectrum, it would behoove our community to unite around this one overriding issue for the upcoming election. There is no stronger message that can be delivered for the cause of Jewish continuity in Ontario.

Orthodox Judaism and homosexuality

Rabbi Steven Greenberg may have obtained ordination from an Orthodox institution, but his views are far removed from anything resembling Orthodox Judaism ("Gay rabbi speaks out," CJN, June 7). He has written in favour of same-sex marriage, and what he calls a more nuanced reading of biblical and rabbinic texts, which extrapolates previously hidden meaning, is full of his own wild distortions and misrepresentations.

His notions have no support in the vast sources of more than 2,000 years of traditional interpretation and commentary, and, therefore, descriptions of him as "the first openly gay Orthodox rabbi" are quite misleading. His writings suggest that he is substantively ignorant of the scientific and psychological aspects of homosexuality.

In recent years, there has been much movement within the broader modern Orthodox community toward a great tolerance and acceptance of people who identify themselves as homosexual, while rejecting same-sex behaviour. If Rabbi Greenberg's activities were limited to just encouraging that broader tolerance and acceptance, there would be less of a problem. Unfortunately, it appears that he has a quite different agenda.

Understanding the Arab-Israeli conflict

By SALLY ZERKER

I'm going to simplify the Arab-Israeli conflict for you. Every pundit and editorial writer tells you that this conflict is the most complex issue in the world, requiring deep thought, creative solutions and of course, first and foremost, major concessions on the part of Israel. None of these experts can conceive of a start to any solution that does not require Israeli concessions. You know and I know that those concessions in the past haven't done a bit of good. On the contrary, they've made things worse. You'll soon understand why.

The simple reasoning that explains the more than 60 years of Arab-Israeli conflict is this: Arabs could not concede losing a war to Jews. Let's be clear that we are dealing with a single, ongoing war, as far as the Arabs are concerned. The various outbreaks have merely been manifestations of the continuing war. Palestinians and their supporting Arab and non-Arab Muslims could not fathom the idea of Jewish military victory.

Didn't everyone know that Jews aren't fighters? For centuries, Muslims knew exactly how to deal with Jews, and they also saw how other powers dealt with Jews. It was the same everywhere. They observed the Jews' "cowardly behaviour" again and again. For 2,000 years, Jews were tormented, murdered and harassed, but they did not take up arms and revolt. To Muslims, they were infidels, something less than human, and yet the Jews remained passive under the domain of the sultan or other authorities in the Muslim world. Jews handled this discrimination by buying their way out of difficulties.

Jews were a wonderful source of money. They were good business for both Christian and Muslim rulers. It was easy to fill the coffers of lords or kings or sultans when you had Jews in your realm and under your domination. To begin with, infidels had to pay higher taxes than Muslims. The Muslim authorities explained this discrimination as generosity on their part in letting Jews dwell anywhere in their territory. Still, both Christians and Jews were apparently better than unbelievers who weren't even "people of the book," and thus they were allowed to stay, as long as they paid up. Armenian Christians, on occasion, had challenged their designation as second-class citizens, but Jews never dared to do this. Or perhaps they knew they had no alternative but to manipulate and plead and buy their way out of trouble. It was a Jewish tradition, one might say.

So what were this new, upstart bunch of Jews doing, pretending they are first-class citizens with the will and the ability to defend themselves?

When I say the Arabs could not accept defeat at the hand of Jews, there's plenty of evidence that this is their reality. Think back to 1947 when the United Nations voted to partition what was left of mandated Palestine after the British had truncated it by carving out the Kingdom of Transjordan from the allocated territory.

(As an aside, do you know why the British did this? No? Well, since they wanted to have access to the oil in Mesopotamia, they created a country called Iraq, giving one Hashemite brother its kingdom. They then had to find another piece of land for the other brother. Why not carve out a piece from the territory that had already been designated by the British as the home for the Jewish people? And so Transjordan – later simplified to Jordan – was born.)

But back to the main subject! What were all the Arab countries incensed about? The remaining parcel of land was divided according to its inhabitants – Arabs to have the area where Arabs lived, Jews to have the part where Jews lived. The size of the Jews' land was not much bigger than the area that constitutes a big city, if you look at a map from that era. But Arabs could in no way concede the right of Jews to live in the land that they considered Muslim territory. The fact that this land had originally been Jewish land was ignored or denied. That the Muslims had been occupiers of that land after more than one military conquest was a fact they also ignored.

David Ben-Gurion declares the establishment of the State of Israel in 1948, the beginning of the ongoing Arab-Israeli conflict, according to the author.

Five Arab countries invaded the newly established Jewish state in 1948 – Egypt, Saudi Arabia, Iraq, Jordan, Syria, Lebanon and Kuwait. They were at ease about that little war, or what they clearly expected to be a little war, because Jews aren't fighters. Or so they believed.

But when they were actually defeated and had to use the United Nations to bail them out and stop the war, that didn't mean they were content to make peace with this infant country. Not at all! The waiting game had just begun. The next round would be better, they were certain. They had all kinds of rationalizations for their defeat. Somehow the Jews had a powerful army that was secretive, because "Jews were always secretive." Or maybe it wasn't Jews they were actually fighting. It was a conspiracy with the United States or Britain, or maybe some other power. But it could not have been the Jews who had defeated all those combined Arab armies.

As we know, no one came to the assistance of the Jews, and it was they alone who fought and salvaged their new, fragile, fledgling country.

However, there was some reinforcement of the conspiracy theory when the British and French attacked Egypt in 1956, along with Israeli forces, all of them acting in concert, each with its own reason. The French and British were attempting to reverse Egypt's takeover of the Suez Canal, while the Israelis were responding to Gamal Abdel Nasser's blocking of the Straits of Tiran, the narrow waterway that is Israel's outlet to the Red Sea.

Of course, the Arabs weren't giving up. The Six Day War of 1967 was the next attempt. They lost again, but were they convinced that they should therefore sue for peace? On the contrary, that was when they issued the famous three "nos" of the Khartoum conference – no peace with Israel, no recognition of Israel, no negotiations with Israel.

Thus began their new war strategy, terrorism as war. Yasser Arafat was the master of their horrible murdering practices, which deemed that there was no such being as an innocent Jew. Children in kindergarten, bus passengers, people in old folks homes, air travellers, Olympic athletes, the more vulnerable the better – all were targets for this new form of war against the Jews. And the techniques were ingenious, the most amazing playing on the willingness of countless numbers of Arabs to commit suicide by strapping explosives to their bodies and using their own bodies as the weapon of choice for killing Jews. It is hard to fathom the death cult of Muslim Arabs if one conceives of life as the ultimate value.

Once upon a time the world would have been appalled at such barbarism, but the Palestinians were now winning over Jew-haters of all stripes and varieties; leftist professors; Muslims who were delighted that they had found an effective way of killing Jewish men, women and children; committed anti-Semites; much of the media of Europe (less so in North America, but still significant in significant numbers), and so on.

But the terrorist message and methodology have come home to roost. Muslims now are killing Muslims by means of suicide bombers. The war between Sunnis and Shiites in Iraq is essentially one relying on suicide techniques, using either an individual body or a car bomb with humans inside, or some other forms of the same concept. Moreover, similar methods have been used in Morocco, Algeria, Indonesia and other Muslim societies.

I once wrote an article titled "First the Jews, and then you." My point in that essay was that no one got excited when terrorist attacks were merely killing Jews. There was no moral outrage and outcry, and the world became accustomed to this horrible homicidal weaponry. Moral outrage at Arafat's methods from the beginning might have worked to prevent the attacks in Bali, London, Madrid – and perhaps even 9/11 in the United States. Instead Arafat became a hero of the left, and Yitzhak Rabin helped make the big lie bigger, by endorsing an image of Arafat as a peace-maker instead of providing the true picture, that of a mass murderer.

You might say that the peace agreements between Israel and Egypt and Israel and Jordan indicate that the Arab and Muslim world has come around to accepting the victory of the Jews in this long war. It's true there are written peace agreements between these two countries and Israel, but the people in these two countries are as hostile as ever. Jordan is still "Judenrein" (free of Jews) with laws that prohibit Jews from settling and owning property in that country. Egypt has withdrawn its ambassador from Israel and Israelis are unwelcome in Egypt in any capacity that normal relations would require, such as professional interchanges and courtesy. This isn't peace, it's a reality check: for now, Jordan and Egypt can't take on Israel in conventional warfare. Moreover, the voice of a non-Arab Muslim, Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad, who has threatened to make of Israel another Holocaust, is applauded throughout the Arab world.

What is happening now as I write this article is the exhibition of the Palestinians willing to destroy themselves, as long as they can continue to fight the Jews. For the first time in its history, Gaza is not dominated by another power – no British, no Egyptians, no Ottomans, no Israelis. Gaza is now in the hands of the Palestinians. So what is the Palestinians' first and only thing on the agenda for this freed territory? It is to build bunkers and tunnels for smuggling arms, and to bring in missiles to make war on Israel from Gaza. The businesses and the buildings that the Jews left in their withdrawal from Gaza have been razed. Palestinians are not about building an economy. They can continue to rely on handouts and spend their energy and time on making war on the Jews. This is still the fundamental Arab mentality, that to make war on the Jews is an ongoing Muslim obligation, even if it involves self-destruction.

Opinions

South Africa damns Israel

The African National Congress (ANC), South Africa's ruling party, actively participated in a recent "week of action" to promote the Palestinian cause.

Lawrence Hart in Hamilton

It embraced a newly formed coalition, the "End Occupation Campaign" and, on June 6, its parliamentary caucus opened a debate in the country's national assembly calling for "Israel's immediate, unconditional and permanent withdrawal of all of its forces to the 1967 borders" and "respect for the democratic state of Palestine and its legislative council." Other demands were also woven into what evolved into a heated exchange between the government and various opposition parties.

Leading the attack from the ANC benches was Intelligence Minister Ronnie Kasrils, who is of Jewish descent, but has a long history of antagonism toward the State of Israel. His address to the assembly, reproduced on the government's website, is a masterpiece of deception, brimful of quotations from Israeli leaders that lack context and verification and peppered with ugly analogies equating Israeli actions with the most repressive of apartheid practices.

Accusing Israel of having in 1948 "rolled out a systematic reign of terror, massacres, dispossession and expulsion" that "drove out the Palestinian population in a horrific episode of ethnic cleansing," Kasrils is now pushing for implementation of UN Resolution 194, "concerning the right of return of refugees" to Israel.

Unfortunately, the hostile positions articulated by Kasrils and the current ANC government are not isolated. They are manifestations of a seemingly visceral anti-Israel bias in a country that is still home to some 80,000 Jews.

South Africans such as Nobel laureate Desmond Tutu and the UN Special Rapporteur on Human Rights in the Palestinian Territories, John Dugard, are among Israel's harshest critics, while Willy Madisha, president of the Congress Of South African Trade Unions (COSATU) has called Israel an "evil state" and has expressed his organization's unwavering support for an international campaign of boycotts, divestment and sanctions against it.

Kasrils claims that he's received threats on his life from members of the Jewish community ever since he began speaking out against Israel. But death threats or not, he, too, will eventually fade from the political landscape. What will remain, however, and what will likely intensify, is the apparently endemic anti-Zionism of the so-called "new South Africa."

How an embattled and dwindling Jewish population copes with such an increasingly prejudiced environment remains to be seen.

Treading a fine line between measured protest and reluctant acquiescence would seem to be the key to survival for those who are committed to staying put. The alternative, of course, is to emigrate. These have always been the only viable choices for Jewish South Africans, regardless of the differing political agendas that have plagued them during both the apartheid years and, perhaps even more strikingly, since then.

The end of Palestine?

By EMANUELE OTTOLENGHI

Already in its death throes after seven years of futile struggle against Israel, the Palestinian national movement suffered a fatal blow when Gaza fell into the hands of Hamas. Now, instead of a state-in-waiting, Palestine is two failed states, under two governments at war with one another.

Emanuele Ottolenghi in Brussels

Hamas in Gaza might still pursue its fight against Israel, and Fatah in the West Bank might still voice the rhetoric of grievance against Israel as the occupier. But the two are now locked in a deadly struggle. Anti-Zionist rhetoric has been waving the ghost of a one-state solution – implying that Israel might disappear, replaced by a united binational state comprising the West Bank and Gaza as well as present Israel. It now looks like there will be a one-state solution after all – Israel, alongside two failed states, both Palestinian and fighting each other.

It hasn't been easy for Palestinian nationalists. Ever since their late leader and national symbol, Yasser Arafat, chose to exploit the intifadah, in September 2000, to extract more concessions from Israel, everything that could possibly go wrong did. First, violence turned Israeli public opinion against the now moribund Oslo process: Ariel Sharon quickly replaced the left-wing peace coalition against which Arafat unleashed his intifadah. Systematic resort by Palestinian factions to terrorism against Israeli civilian targets only created the momentum for Israel's military offensive in March 2002. West Bank towns were re-occupied and the backbone of the terror network that seemed so close to breaking Israel' s will was crushed.

Arafat's flirtation with gun-toting militias and myriad armed groups only earned him confinement by Israel and isolation from America. Sharon easily won the next electoral round and set the stage for unilateralism – Israel would withdraw to borders of its choosing and the Palestinians would be left behind once more. The spectre of this move did nothing to propel Palestinian leaders to bring an end to the mounting anarchy within their ranks and sue for peace.

Instead, Arafat allowed anarchy to grow, as if it would only harm the enemies of Palestine, and not Palestine itself. Eventually, the persistent refusal of the Palestinian Authority, first under Arafat, then under current president Mahmoud Abbas, to disarm all militias and dismantle all terror networks yielded the outcome that all but fools would predict.

Alas, it's too late to disarm the militias. Brother will fight brother, while the West Bank and Gaza go their separate ways. At last, Abbas seems to understand the need to establish a monopoly over the use of force. Hamas clearly understands this, too, and it has moved to disarm everyone not loyal to it in Gaza. But this is too little, too late. Two governments are now in place, and with them, two separate entities are slowly coming into being. They'll play this war out to the bitter end. The West has already chosen its horse, not realizing this is a cockfight in which the audience can do little else but watch.

There is little rejoicing in this turn of events, but it must be understood for what it is: the end of Palestinian national aspirations.

Hamas' takeover in Gaza has created a small Islamic state on the shores of the Mediterranean, next door to both Israel and Egypt. Helped by Iran and Syria, Hamas has now opened a southern front in its war against Israel, but in the process, it has made Palestine as a state even less viable than before.

Now, Hamastan needs to conquer the West Bank to make itself the credible and legitimate champion of the Palestinian struggle. Meanwhile, Fatahland will try to regain its lost territory of Gaza before it can even begin to negotiate credibly with Israel. An endless war will further contribute to Palestine's demise. For ordinary Palestinians, seven years of the intifadah yielded nothing but grief, death and poverty. The passage of time did nothing to strengthen Palestinian territorial claims: if anything it gave time to Israeli settlements to expand and Israeli control over Jerusalem to tighten.

As Hamas assumes control over Gaza, Gazans are longing for the return of the despised Israelis. Palestinian intellectuals have conceded that Palestinians might need to be "re-occupied" by an international force led by the Arab league – a return to the pre-1967 occupation by Jordan and Egypt, no less. Now, not even this option seems available – unless, that is, foreign forces are sent to fight Hamas and re-conquer Gaza.

With Hamas' takeover of Gaza, history has finally drawn its curtain on the two-state solution. Before Palestinian nationalism can reclaim one Palestine, complete, and before it can even settle for the meagre leftovers Israel has held for 40 years, Palestinians must face their own, wearing each other out, Hamastan against Fatahland, while the Israelis look on.

Nothing is inevitable in the Middle East

For years, talking heads and Middle East "experts," including academics from top universities, have been declaring the "inevitability" of a Palestinian state based on the "1967 borders" (which are actually the 1949 ceasefire lines).

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

According to this conventional wisdom, Jerusalem is going to be the shared capital of both Israel and this Palestinian state. Their quick peace recipe calls for knocking mostly Israeli and some Palestinian heads together until this deterministic prophecy becomes reality.

However, in international politics, and in the Middle East in particular, nothing is "inevitable." Instead, such predictions reflect wishful thinking that ignores or distorts deep-seated Palestinian rejectionism and violence that shows no sign of disappearing.

The myths also blame Israel and the "occupation" for the absence of peace, and even for internal Palestinian cruelty and civil warfare, including the brutal murders in the hospitals and streets of Gaza.

In contrast, a serious analysis leads to a very different source of responsibility for this all-directional violence. For almost 60 years, the international community has patronized the Palestinians, treating them as helpless victims who are unable to take control of their own fate. Just as Palestinians were not held accountable for decades of terrorism, they were also not encouraged to take action to prevent violence and corruption within their own society.

The massive welfare system run by UNRWA (United Nations Relief and Works Agency for Palestine Refugees in the Near East) has contributed greatly to this process. The massive amounts of money kept flowing, and the photo opportunities continued, regardless of the corruption or the incitement and terror that was being promoted by some UNRWA employees and from within its schools and other institutions.

Similarly, for years, the main international aid donors provided Palestinian leader Yasser Arafat and his PLO henchman with steady bags of cash, much of which ended up in secret bank accounts, or bought weapons and explosives. There were certainly no signs of economic or democratic development. (The European Union's report on its role in Palestinian corruption remains secret, despite the emphasis on transparency in Europe's preachings to others.)

Canada, which often follows the European version of conventional wisdom, is also responsible for some of this disaster, having provided a great deal of funding to UNRWA and to the NGO network.

Hamas and its supporters grew resentful of the corrupt and inept leadership of the PLO and Fatah, and began to take power. Under these conditions, the effort to prop up the remaining façade of the Palestinian Authority, created under the 1993 Oslo agreement and headed by Mahmoud Abbas, could not have succeeded, and the capture of Gaza was the latest step in this process. Had the calls from the United States and others to provide Fatah with weapons been heeded, they would have simply been captured by Hamas.

As a result, instead of moving "inevitably" toward the promised peace agreement, we now have a civil war with two Palestinian Authorities – both of which are failed proto-states – turning into new Somalias or Afghanistans.

The main question now is how to respond. There is no basis for clinging to the myths that the radical Islamic leaders of Hamas will suddenly become responsible partners seeking stability in Gaza. Aid that continues to flow into this area must finally come under very strict controls, both to prevent diversion for terror and to end the culture of victimization and dependency.

At the same time, Fatah and the Palestinian Authority are in a stronger position in the West Bank (Judea and Samaria), and having finally awoken, they may be able to fight off the challenge posed by Hamas.

At best, this will take many years, and the Palestinian side will remain unstable and not readily predictable. In this environment, those who insist on clinging to the myths of "inevitability" and magical instant peace will cause even greater damage.

Israel weighs Syria's diplomatic overtures

Sheldon Kirshner
in Toronto

Prime Minister Ehud Olmert recently urged Arab League states to start peace talks with Israel without preconditions. Yet strangely enough, Olmert seems hardly eager to resume negotiations with Syria, saying that Damascus must fulfil a raft of conditions even before discussions can begin in earnest.

Syria's interest in renewing talks, broken off seven years ago, is clear. Last week, Syria's ambassador to the United Nations called on Israel to return to the negotiating table, and earlier, Syria's deputy foreign minister, Ahmed Arnous, said that his country desires "to renew talks upon the land for peace principle, without preconditions, to bring about stability and security in the region."

Nearly three months ago, the Speaker of the U.S. House of Representatives, Nancy Pelosi, relayed a similar message from Syrian President Bashar Assad. Shortly afterward, in an intriguing development, Ibrahim Suleiman, a Syrian American businessman with close ties to his homeland, informed the Knesset that Syria was ready for peace. Last December, following a trip to Damascus, United States Senator Arlen Specter told Olmert that Assad is interested in resuming talks. Around the same time, Syrian Foreign Minister Walid Moallem sounded an identical theme, saying in a Washington Post interview that Syria is willing to renew talks "without preconditions."

Responding to these overtures, Olmert has expressed a willingness to sign a peace treaty with Syria. But like his predecessor, Ariel Sharon, he has laid down a list of conditions: Syria must end its support and sponsorship of Hamas and Islamic Jihad, both of which have yet to reconcile themselves to Israel's existence. Syria must refrain from providing logistical support and weapons to Hezbollah – which fought a war with Israel last summer – and stop trying to destabalize its neighbour, Lebanon. Syria must cut relations with Iran, whose president has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction. And, in a nod to Israel's ally, the United States, Olmert has demanded that Syria must prevent anti-American insurgents from reaching Iraq via Syrian territory.

Olmert's demands are echoed in an Israeli foreign ministry paper, which states that Israel is "committed to peace with all its neighbours, including Syria," but berates Syria for having failed "to demonstrate that it has made a genuine and strategic choice for peace." Citing particulars, Israel says that Syria allows Islamic Jihad and Hamas to maintain offices in Damascus and that it nurtures its alliance with Iran.

The paper adds: "In light of this record, Syria's recent calls for talks appear to be made for the sake of relieving international pressure and the isolation that its policies have produced." It concludes with these words: "To engage the Syrian regime, in the absence of any real change in its actions on the ground, would be to reward [Syria] for policies that have greatly endangered the Middle East and the cause of peace." David Baker, an official in Olmert's office, reiterated this stance: "The position of the Israeli government remains the same. The Syrian government is not pursuing peace but is merely posturing."

Despite its public skepticism, Israel has sent peace feelers to Damascus through Turkey, Germany and Greece, as Deputy Prime Minister and former defence minister Shaul Mofaz has noted.

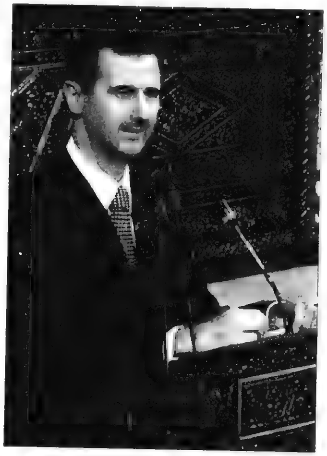
According to reports, Israel is currently in the process of reviewing Syrian motives, trying to assess what it might receive in exchange for giving up the Golan Heights (where 20,000 Israelis live in 33 settlements) and what the nature of future bilateral relations with Syria might be. Israel is also attempting to determine whether Syria would consider severing ties with Iran, Hezbollah and Palestinian radical organizations such as Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

The assessment is being conducted by the foreign ministry, which was charged with this task by Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni last August after the 34-day war in Lebanon.

Israel and Syria, which have fought three wars since 1948, entered into direct negotiations at the 1991 Madrid peace conference. These talks, which adjourned to Washington, lasted until Hamas and Islamic Jihad terrorists carried out three successive suicide attacks in Jerusalem and Tel Aviv in 1996 that claimed the lives of 60 Israelis.

Before these talks collapsed, Israeli and Syrian negotiators addressed three central issues – the depth of and timetable for an Israeli withdrawal from the Golan (which Israel annexed in 1981), the character of a peace agreement, and the contours of security arrangements. Syria demanded a full withdrawal to the pre-1967 armistice lines, while Israel insisted on a pullback to the 1921 international border, a difference of a few kilometres.

Talks resumed in 1999, though Israel and Syria maintained secret contacts until then. The second round of talks, brokered by the United States, broke down in March 2000 over Syria's refusal to cede the northeast corner of the Sea of Galilee, which Syria held prior to the 1967 Six Day War. Still, as Syria's then-foreign minister observed, 80 per cent of the contentious issues had been resolved.



President Bashar Assad of Syria

After becoming acting prime minister in January 2006, Olmert basically dismissed Syria's peace overtures and spoke of the need for Israel to keep the Golan, prompting Assad to remark that Israel was too weak to make peace. In fact, Olmert preferred to focus on the Palestinian track, despite the formation of a Hamas government that refused to renounce terrorism or come to terms with Israel.

Apart from his belief that the Golan should remain in Israel's hands, Olmert's reluctance to engage Syria is rooted in the knowledge that the United States is hostile to the Baathist regime in Damascus. The Bush administration, having accused Syria of stoking the current insurgency in Iraq and planning the assassination of former Lebanese prime minister Rafik Hariri, withdrew its ambassador in Damascus and imposed economic sanctions on Syria.

Washington argues that Syria will exploit talks with Israel to extricate itself from its international isolation. Shimon Peres, Israel's former deputy prime minister and now its president, has admittted that Israel "cannot go against American policy and hold negotiations with Syria."

Olmert, who was in Washington last week to meet President George W. Bush, is evidently constrained by the United States' attitude. But in Israel, there has been a groundswell of support for resurrecting the Syrian track, its proponents ranging from Chief of Staff Gen. Gabi Ashkenazi to Minister of National Infrastructure Binyamin Ben-Eliezer. They believe that an accord with Syria – which former U.S. president Bill Clinton thinks is eminently achievable – would encourage other Arab countries to establish diplomatic relations with Israel and prompt Damascus to distance itself from Iran, Hezbollah and Palestinian extremists, thereby contributing to a new regional order and a measure of stability in the Middle East.

Opponents of a rapprochement with Syria, such as Mossad director Meir Dagan, have voiced grave doubts about Syria's intentions. But Dagan's analysis has been challenged by Amos Yadlin, the chief of military intelligence, and Yossi Beiditz, the head of the foreign ministry's research department. Ilan Mizrahi, the chair of Israel's National Security Council, says that Syria's call for a dialogue is authentic, but admits that Syria may be more interested in a peace process rather than peace. Itamar Rabinovich, Israel's chief negotiator with Syria in the 1990s, has asserted that Israel should take advantage of Syria's outstretched hand.

Syrian officials from Assad on down have belligerently warned that war could break out if Israel rejects peace and clings to the Golan. This is not an idle threat. Syria, having learned the lessons of last year's war in Lebanon, has rearmed and built up its forces. In anticipation of a possible Syrian offensive, Israel has held intensive maneuvres on the Golan.

Jewish Toronto

This edition of Jewish Toronto is devoted to the work of Reena, a UJA Federation partner agency dedicated to integrating individuals who have a developmental disability into the mainstream of society.

Dinner propels fundraising for unique project past half-way point

More than 1,200 supporters recently attended the Reena Foundation's gala dinner at the Sheraton Centre Hotel in downtown Toronto, honouring Ellis Jacob, CEO of Cineplex Entertainment.

Many representatives of film houses and studios came out to pay tribute to him and responded to his call for financial support of the Foundation. Special guests included noted lawyer Eddie Greenspan, who served as MC for the evening and Gerry Schwartz of Onex Corporation.

The funds raised at this year's dinner are dedicated to Reena's ambitious goal of purchasing an integrated apartment building that will provide housing for individuals with a developmental disability. Reena began planning and fundraising for this campaign last year, and this year's dinner brought Reena beyond the financial half-way point in raising enough for a down payment on the building. In addition to providing homes for Reena clients, apartments will be available to the general public, making it a self-sustaining operation.

"With up to 30% of the apartments occupied by Reena clients, they will have a strong sense of ownership of their environment, and a unique opportunity to interact with other tenants as they become integrated into the broader community," said Reena president and CEO Sandy Keshen.

"The money is going to a very special project that will have a lasting impact on the lives of people with developmental disabilities. The fact that it is self-sustaining means the Reena Integrated Apartment Project will deliver benefits far into the future. And that appeals to the business person in me," noted Jacob.

"I thank everyone who contributed to and worked so hard on this gala dinner to support an incredibly worthy cause. As in business, this shared commitment, this common bond, is a powerful force. It unites us and focuses our efforts, and allows us to achieve remarkable things," Keshen noted.

Young woman finds success at the movies

Cineplex Entertainment is not only known for its prominent role as a film exhibitor, it also assists Reena clients. One of them is Kimosha Renaud.

Since May 2006, Renaud has been part of Reena's Pathway day program, which helps young adults with a developmental disability make a successful transition from school to work or community participation.

Renaud has taken part in many activities such as delivering Reena's mail, math, reading, arts and crafts, and outings in the community. She also volunteers at The Salvation Army Thrift Store, Winners, and Homebase, a centre for homeless youth.

In mid-October 2006, Renaud, who was very determined to get a job in the community, put together a resume and started the job search. After all the hard work, Silver City Richmond Hill, owned by Cineplex, called Renaud in February of this year for an interview. It was so successful that Renaud has been working at Silver City for about three months, both on the floor and in ticket administration. Her training was not easy but she pulled through and made it all happen. "I work hard, but it's great fun," she said.

"We are all extremely proud of Kimosha. There is so much more ahead in this young woman's life. When you want to watch a movie, drop by the Richmond Hill Silver City. Say hi to Kimosha and commend her for doing so well," said Ann Szabo, Reena outreach director.

New home for aging Reena clients

David Smuschkowitz and his wife Luba were recently given a special preview of Reena's second ElderHome which will bear their name in recognition of their lead gift and leadership role to raise the funds for the facility.

Reena's newest residence at Weldrick and Bathurst, in Richmond Hill, across from UJA Federation's new Joseph and Wolf Lebovic Jewish Community Campus, provides a home for older adults with developmental disabilities.

During their visit, the Smuschkowitzes were introduced to the first of ten seniors who will live in the carefully designed spacious home. They met with three Reena clients whose group homes were no longer adequate for their growing needs. They also met Leonard Andrews, now 58 years old, who had lived in the Huronia Regional Centre for 50 of those years.

Currently five seniors are living in their new home and in the coming months, five more who are currently in institutions, will make the ElderHome a full house.

Having people with similar support needs living together allows them to thrive as active members of their community. Hence, the house is equipped with an elevator, wheelchair accessible washrooms, a state of the art therapeutic bath tub, ceiling tracks for motorized lifts in each room to assist people in wheel-chairs and a wandering persons alert system to ensure safety for individuals who require this extra support.

Residents who are able, and wish to do so, attend Reena's day programs for older adults at the Toby and Henry Battle Developmental Centre. Staff is on hand for those who choose to remain at the ElderHome or are too frail to participate. The home is situated beside Conservation Authority land with pleasant scenic routes for a wheelchair outing.

"It is heart warming to see that seniors who have a developmental disability have such a fine and welcoming place to live in as they age," said David Smuschkowitz. "I have to thank my friend Alex Eisen for persuading me to become involved," he added.

Reena expands successful camping program

Last summer was a first for Reena clients at Camp Northland B'nai Brith in Haliburton, when TEN young people, ages 7-16, enjoyed three days of swimming, water sports, arts and crafts and evening cookouts. The children were housed in their own cabins, but participated in many activities with the rest of the camp, including meals and dances.

This summer, the program will not only be expanded to three one-week trips, but four clients will spend all of the second session in a cabin with Northland campers and staff. "We could not be more excited about this upcoming summer," said Reena outreach director, Ann Szabo. "We know that just like last year, this summer will be incredible."

Szabo noted how amazing it was for the staff to watch the young Reena clients climb a six-foot wall, or take a trip around the lake in a canoe. The other campers, too, learned much from interacting with the Reena campers, she said, gaining tolerance, sensitivity and acceptance towards people with developmental disabilities.

She said that parents whose children are attending their first-ever overnight camp experience enjoy a great sense of freedom.

"They can totally relax knowing that their son or daughter is enjoying all the fun and challenges of camp life in a safe, nurturing and welcoming environment. This short respite is very welcome when dealing with the 24/7 responsibility of caring for a child who is developmentally disabled."

This year's Walk With Israel embodies goal of inclusion

By RAQUEL KAPLAN GOLDBERG
UJA FEDERATION

Sporting blue and white hats and small flags emblazoned with the Reena logo, more than 30 Reena clients proudly walked with Israel on May 27 under the UJA Federation Inclusion Initiative banner, "We All Belong."

They were joined by Reena CEO and president Sandy Keshen and a number of "our incredible staff," says Arlene Margolese, manager of faith, cultural and volunteers services at Reena, which coordinated the group's participation.

"People with developmental disabilities, like all people with special needs, don't want to be singled out," Margolese says, explaining the importance for Reena clients of being able to join in the Walk With Israel. "They want to be part of the community like everyone else and I believe we accomplished that goal at this year's walk. While our group was, of course, proud to be representing Reena, they were like everyone else in that they were proud to be Jewish, proud to be counted, and proud to be contributing members of the community."

After helping to pack t-shirts and prize kits with other UJA Federation volunteers last year, Reena clients prepared for this year's walk through group discussions that explored their role in the community, the importance of taking pride in their Jewish heritage, and what it means to contribute to the community and be a part of something bigger than oneself.

"Everybody should have the opportunity to contribute and be part of something special, to be part of the community and be able to do their share," reflects Margolese. "And, in fact, the community is becoming more accessible to people with different needs. It's a long haul, but we are certainly making headway."

Reena clients at this year's UJA Federation Walk With Israel

Reena's participation also brought with it an unexpected chance to expose other ethnic communities to the Walk With Israel. "We have a diverse clientele and after we talked about the walk and encouraged people to attend, we had, for example, parents of a Portuguese client inquiring about it," Margolese recalls. "It gave us an opportunity to explain and educate people of other cultural groups. It was wonderful PR to increase awareness outside the Jewish community."

When all was said and done, "everybody had a wonderful time," says Margolese. "The entertainment and the celebrations before and after the actual walk were great and it was just a wonderful day, mostly because people came together and were one."

UJA Federation builds confidence in Reena client

By A.M. SEGAL
UJA FEDERATION

Ask Lorne Rothenberg's workmates at UJA Federation of Greater Toronto what they think of him and rave reviews are universal.

When Lorne comes to work, communicating with his colleagues requires a bit of innovation. That's because the 37-year-old, a Reena client, is autistic and, for the most part, unable to articulate his thoughts by speaking. In addition, his reading and writing abilities are somewhat limited.

"Lorne is very well accepted here," says UJA Federation's Joel Verbin, a mentor to Lorne. "I don't know of one person in the building I've ever come across who didn't appreciate him being around."

Physically fit and experienced with administrative duties, Lorne does everything from helping to move office equipment and loading materials, to assisting with mail duties and interfacing with couriers.

He works at UJA three times a week and, on the other week days, engages in packaging and assembling at JVS Toronto.

Lorne's employment at UJA is in line with the Federation's policy of inclusion, which promotes the participation of all members of the community – including those with physical and mental disabilities - in the workforce, and in communal life.

"One of the things that has worked out well for Lorne at UJA is the focus on what his abilities are, and there really are lots of abilities," relates his mother, Brenda Rothenberg, adding that Lorne is very independent and lives on his own during the week.

To facilitate his role, Lorne meets with Glenn Ip, an employment consultant from JVS, who previously assisted him at Rogers, where he worked for 17 years.

"In the beginning, Lorne worked one shift a week, and I stayed there with him to help him through every step of the job," explains Ip. "Now, Lorne has increased to three days and I only see him for an hour or two, twice a week." Ip says the initial employment period for a person with a developmental disability like Lorne is quite critical, as he or she needs to gain familiarity and confidence.

As their self-confidence grows, they are able to take on more duties, with less coaching. In Lorne's case, Ip says, the mentoring and accommodating culture at UJA helped him gain confidence quickly. "The way he is treated there is fantastic," Ip says." He is welcomed by the team and that has helped to build trust."

CIC drops nine positions after budget cutback

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

The Canada-Israel Committee (CIC) has slashed nine positions in the wake of a budgetary cutback of slightly less than four per cent.

Five of the people were let go and new positions in Jewish organizations have been found for the others – three within CIC and one in its affiliated agency, the Quebec-Israel Committee (QIC).

The moves were painful but necessary given the fiscal realities facing the agency and the need to re-organize to better comply with its mandate of pro-Israel advocacy, said CIC chief executive officer Shimon Fogel.

"It was significant and required some important reflection by the CIC leadership how it wanted to go," he said. Part of that process included a reassessment of activities to determine which could best be done inside the agency and which could be done by other community groups.

Since the 2003 creation of CIJA, the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, an organization that allocates funds among various community organizations, Jewish agencies have restructured to more effectively advocate on behalf of Israel and counter anti-Israel and anti-Semitic outbreaks. CIC has been a major recipient of CIJA-directed funding, with its budget more than doubling since 2003.

Some previous CIC activities have been shifted to partner organizations, and CIC has "tried to reconcile our essential mandate to the resources available," Fogel said.

"That led to the closure of some positions that had nothing to do with the individuals who served in those positions," he said.

It was "painful… to see loyal, dedicated people let go," he added

The areas affected included community outreach and grassroots development – not core CIC activities, Fogel said – as well as research. The latter cut meant the departure of well-respected academic David Goldberg, a long-standing CIC employee.

Fogel noted the nature of research has changed substantially in the last few years because of new technologies and easier access to materials that were not readily available 10 to 15 years ago.

Fogel said that while CIC's budget has been increasing since 2000, three years before CIJA came on the scene, the cutbacks come in the context of increasing community demand for limited resources allocated by CIJA. He suggested CIC might have been the first community agency to have to deal with funding restrictions. "Hopefully our process will serve as a template for other agencies to assess what it is they do and how they do it."

CIC – which employs 25 people in its Ottawa, Toronto, Montreal (home of the QIC), Vancouver and Israel offices – will focus its energies on government and policy issues, as well as missions to Israel and media relations, he said.

CIJA chief executive officer Hershell Ezrin said CIJA has doubled CIC's funding since 2003, but it also had demands to finance other community priorities, including security, fighting Internet hate and supporting students on campus.

Ezrin said even with the budget cutback of less than four per cent – which affects CIC, QIC and missions to Israel – "pro-Israel advocacy is the largest by far programming that CIJA does."

He declined to provide a dollar figure for the allocation.

Not all Israel-advocacy money finds its way to CIC. Other agencies, such as Canadian Jewish Congress, run programs and activities that affect how the Canadian public perceives Israel.

Congress, for example, has lobbied labour unions to modify their positions on Israel. CIJA's University Outreach Committee has successfully called on university presidents at York, Concordia, McGill and the University of British Columbia to condemn the British University and College Union's (UCU) proposed academic boycott of Israel.

Ezrin said CIJA operates on a fixed budget – not including one-time programs funded by donors – and faces competing priorities from various agencies, all of them meeting Jewish advocacy requirements.

The money CIJA allocates, which was raised in community fundraising campaigns, "is not for agencies; it's for programs and activities," he said.

"CIC has done a wonderful job and they are taking advantage of this opportunity to look at new, innovative ways of programming delivery," he added

Brosh prepares to return to Israel

During his tenure as consul general, he facilitated visits to the Jewish state by delegations from six universities, and he co-ordinated another mission from 12 Canadian medical centres.

In 2003, when he arrived, the intifadah was winding down, but Canadians' perception of Israel was that it was marked by a "terror war."

The average Canadian, Brosh said, was unaware of Israel's high-tech achievements, its music scene, its deaf-and-blind theatre group, its thriving film scene, its attention to fine cuisine, and other aspects of a rich cultural life.

He set about demonstrating these aspects of Israeli life, though he acknowledges it was sometimes a tough go, given the media's focus on terror attacks.

"With the terror war in control, it was easier to show the good face of Israel," he said.

Among non-Jews, evangelical Christians were quite supportive of Israel, but attitudes toward Israel from some unions, such as CUPE Ontario, and among many on Canadian campuses were problematic, Brosh said.

As for the news coverage of Mideast events, he said the Canadian media "does not generally portray Israel as the party in the wrong."

He believes "the man in the street" sees Israel as another democracy and supports its fight against terrorism.

"That's the view of the Canadian people. They do not always support all Israel does, but they see what's right and wrong and who seeks peace and who doesn't," he said.

TODAY'S LESSON:
CHANGE IS ON THE WAY

As of July 1, 2007 UJA Federation's Board of Jewish Education will be replaced by: The Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education.
המרכז לקידום חינוך יהודי

The Mercaz (centre in Hebrew) is the new nickname.

The Mercaz is the new strategic and proactive education pillar of UJA Federation. Its role is to enhance the quality, quantity and accessibility of Jewish education throughout the GTA by:

- Placing primary attention on children and parents.
- Maintaining a commitment to tuition subsidies to low-income families and exploring new education financing solutions for middle-income earners.
- Monitoring the quality of all Mercaz-affiliated day schools, supplementary programs and informal education settings.
- Finding practical solutions to make a Jewish education more accessible to all families.
- Focusing on strategic educational planning for the community.

The creation of the Mercaz follows two years of research by a UJA Federation task force and an implementation committee.

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Jewish Life

Of minorities and majorities

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER

RABBINICAL REFLECTIONS

With minority governments in both Ottawa and Quebec City, let's think about majorities and minorities in Jewish thought.

Exodus 23 tells us, "Do not follow a multitude to do evil." Rashi and Ibn Ezra suggest that we should not follow a majority blindly when our conscience demands otherwise, nor should we trust a majority without question.

This Torah dictum calls into question the notion of party discipline, by which government leaders muster their votes into a bloc and maintain their positions. The Torah might ask an individual MP to forsake party discipline and to vote his or her conscience if a situation is considered to be one of life or death.

The Torah is saying that majority rule only has benefit when it seeks good and not evil, life and not death.

Jewish courts in capital cases consisted of 23 judges: 10 for to argue for acquittal, 10 to argue for for conviction, plus one to assure a majority. Yet conviction can't be based on the word of one person alone, but upon the word of two or three, so two more were added, making 23. A court that large already has the nature of a small parliament or a modern-day board, where people can be swayed toward a large majority.

That's why the rabbis demanded that 10 argue for acquittal and 10 for conviction, to force even a majority who are inclined to recommend the death sentence to consider the other side and argue for it.

Similarly, in minority governments, argument, debate and question period become crucial. This is how all sides can criticize and respond, and how the public can learn about the full scope of issues. This requires us to be good listeners until the next election.

The Torah portion Balak also provides an example of using the power of a majority to shape opinion.

Balak fears Israel's passing through his territory. He wants the non-Jewish prophet Balaam to curse them. Balaam, aware of Israel's relationship with God, ignores Balak's command. So Balak sent a rabbim of princes, meaning "many princes" or "the majority of princes," or even "a group more honorable" than the previous bunch he had sent. They told Balaam, "Balak will promote you to great honour. Come, curse this people."

How often have we seen this ploy? Bedecked in their finery, arriving by palanquin or in limousines, the greats of the land appear before one whom they wish to influence, offering emoluments and hoping to leverage a decision.

Torah condemns the use of a majority of the greats of the land to shape decisions that favour their own cause. Balaam tells this group of princes that all the gold and silver in the world couldn't buy him.

But despite his denials, Balaam gets up early and goes to curse Israel. It's then that Balaam can no longer be considered a prophet by any camp, for he has thrown away his credentials in order to accept the benefits of wealthy princes.

A minority government has the opportunity to be a prophet, to do what's just and what's right, and even what's hard and disagreeable, but few have the courage to be prophetic.

Minority governments stand at the precipice of losing the confidence of the legislature throughout their term, creating a temptation to follow the will of the kingmakers – to do what will bring them more power, more election money and a future majority. That does not necessarily mean doing what is right.

If the prime minister and provincial premier can show leadership by adhering to principles and promises, they may be seen as prophetic, and they'll be respected. But if they listen to kingmakers, when the next election comes, they'll be perceived as another Balaam – puppets in denial, their strings pulled by those who can help their re-election.

With minority governments in place in both Ottawa and Quebec, uvacharta vachaim, choose life, should be the motto, and not choose popularity or princes.

A Jewish summer reading list

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

JEWISH EDUCATION
The Next Generation

My suggestions for summer reading contain no potboilers or gossipy page-turners, but for those interested in Judaism, here are some books that I have found to be of worth in the last 12 months.

For several years, Yeshiva University has been publishing volumes that emerge from its Orthodox Forum conferences. The one released last year has proven to be especially timely. Titled Jewish Spirituality and Divine Law, it looks at the complex relationship and tension between Jewish rituals and obligations and the search for spiritual meaning. The essays touch on spirituality in the Bible, as well as in Jewish prayer and Jewish education, Jewish art, chassidut and Kabbalah. The writers are world-renowned and respected scholars, the subject matter is important, and the volume is, on the whole, very readable.

In the wake of the Gaza expulsions of 2005 and the general focus on settlements in Israel comes a book of historical essays by Rabbi Abraham Isaac Kook, the first chief rabbi of Palestine. When God Becomes History presents a sampling of Rav Kook's essays and letters on topics pertaining to the Land of Israel, as well as his historic address at the opening of Hebrew University in 1925.

A book that really snuck under the radar last year but is a very creative and insightful piece of biblical commentary is Wrestling Jacob by Rabbi Shmuel Klitsner, who teaches at Midreshet Lindenbaum in Jerusalem. Rabbi Klitsner and his wife, Judy, are renowned Tanach specialists, and in this book, Rabbi Klitsner analyzes, with great care and sensitivity, the passages in Genesis that tell the story of Jacob. His approach is psychological and literary while firmly based in traditional exegesis.

I am often asked about books that can be used by the whole family as a form of Jewish learning. One lovely series in this regard was produced by Joel Lurie Grishaver, a well-known maverick when it comes to creating Jewish educational materials. In a three-part series titled You Be the Judge, a number of hypothetical cases, usually with an ethical twist, are offered to readers to adjudicate, with possible Torah sources and answers for the problem appearing on the next page. It's perfect for Shabbat table discussion or just user friendly learning, especially for kids who don't like the traditional slogging through dense Hebrew texts.

Finally, I suggest two related texts about the times we live in, where terror seems to be the operative metaphor and catchphrase of the age. Mark Steyn's America Alone warns – with biting humour, quirky examples and a mass of statistics – of the growing threat of Islamic terror, starting with the plain problem of demographics. Put simply, western believers in democracy and liberalism are not having enough babies, unlike their ideological adversaries who are reproducing rapidly. Europe, in Steyn's thesis, is already lost, and America is the last bulwark against fundamentalist violence.

In a similar vein, but in much denser, more academic terms, Paul Berman's Terror and Liberalism dissects the philosophical roots of terrorism and places it in historical contexts that far predate Osama Bin Laden and even World War II.

Both books are well worth buying, but they're not for the squeamish. The potential horrors unveiled within, though not of the gross-out variety, are frightening indeed.

Quotations on every subject

The Yale Book of Quotations, edited by Fred R. Shapiro, Yale University Press.

Books
Bernard Baskin

At first, I didn't want to buy this book. The price is steep ($65 US), and my library already has a shelf of books that deal with quotations. But after a few moments of random browsing I was won over. This massive volume of more than 1,000 pages, containing 12,000 quotations, was different from the others.

It covers quotations not only from literary and historical sources but also from popular culture, sports, politics, law and the social sciences. Anonymously authored items appear in sections devoted to folk songs, advertising slogans, film lines, television and proverbs.

The quotations that follow should be of interest to readers of The CJN.

From physicist Albert Einstein:

- I am by heritage a Jew, by citizenship a Swiss, and by makeup a human being, and only a human being, without any special attachment to any state or national entity whatsoever.
- We know nothing about it (God and the world) at all. All our knowledge is but the knowledge of schoolchildren. Possibly we shall know a little more that we do now. But the real nature of things, that we shall never know, never. Jewish Sentinel, September 1931
- If I would be a young man again and had to decide how to make my living, I would not try to become a scientist or scholar or teacher. I would rather choose to be a plumber or a pedlar in the hope to find that modest degree of independence still available under current circumstances. November 1954

From former British prime minister Benjamin Disraeli:

- On his deathbed, declining a visit from Queen Victoria: No it is better not. She would only ask me to take a message to Albert.
- Replying to anti-Semitic taunting in the House of Commons: Yes, I am a Jew! When the ancestors of the honourable gentleman were brutal savages in an unknown island, mine were priests in the temple!
- Lies, damned lies, and statistics.

From writer Mark Twain:

- Man was made at the end of the week's work, when God was tired.
- Man is the only animal that blushes. Or needs to.
- I have no race prejudices, and I think I have no colour prejudices nor caste prejudices nor creed prejudices. Indeed, I know it. I can stand any society. All that I care to know is that a man is a human being – that is enough for me; he can't be any worse. Concerning the Jews, 1899

From diarist Anne Frank:

- Is discord going to show itself while we are still fighting, is the Jew once again worth less than another? Oh it is sad, very sad, that once more, for the umpteenth time, the old truth is confirmed: "What one Christian does is his own responsibility, what one Jew does is thrown back at all Jews." Diary of Anne Frank, entry on May 22, 1944

From former Israeli prime minister Golda Meir:

- Let me tell you something that we Israelis have against Moses. He took us 40 years through the desert in order to bring us to the one spot in the Middle East that has no oil.

From comic actor Groucho Marx:

- Responding to a beach club telling him he couldn't join because he was Jewish: My son's only half Jewish. Would it be all right if he went in the water up to his knees?

From former British prime minister Arthur Balfour:

- In Palestine we do not propose even to go through the form of consulting the wishes of the present inhabitants of the country… The four great powers are committed to Zionism. And Zionism, be it right or wrong, good or bad, is rooted in age-long traditions, in present needs, in future hopes, of far profounder import than the desires and prejudices of the 700,000 Arabs who now inhabit that ancient land. Memorandum respecting Syria, Palestine and Mesopotamia, Aug. 11, 1919.

Resources for the deaf, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish
Highway

How do you say mazal tov or Rosh Hashanah using sign language? David Bar-Tzur is one of the many people who shares resources on the web for deaf Jewish people, as well as for the larger community. Today, we continue our look at the best of them.

Bar-Tzur is working on creating a glossary of religious terms for American Sign Language (ASL) interpreters. In addition to religious phrases from other faiths, Bar-Tzur includes many Jewish words and terms in his glossary. Bar-Tzur's translation into sign language notation may look cryptic to most of us. But when these words are animated into sweeping arm movements and gestures, non-hearing Jews can share in the phrases that are so loved by the rest of the community. [www.theinterpretersfriend.com]

Bar-Tzur has also created the single best page that I have come across that summarizes resources (online and other) for Jewish deaf. This page has everything from recommendations about books and CDs to tips about dealing with biblical sign language that may carry Christian connotations. [http://tinyurl.com/ys8w2b]

For more practical information, check out the Orthodox Union's Our Way site, which includes Jewish holiday guides such as the Chanukah candlelighting sign-language blessing chart and Signs of the Seder, a pamphlet about celebrating a seder in sign language. The same page also has the handbook Hearing-Impaired Child in the Jewish Classroom, and strategies for creating a synagogue that is blind/deaf friendly. [http://tinyurl. com/2toz36]

Speaking of which, Bene Shalom is a reform congregation in Skokie, Ill., that has a membership of 200 deaf and hearing families. [www.beneshalom. org/] In 1992, the affiliated Hebrew Seminary of the Deaf was established. The seminary's five-year program includes all the standard curriculum and courses of study required for rabbinical ordination. In addition, all students must become proficient signers in ASL, as well as learning Hebrew Sign Language. These skills will enable them, as rabbis and teachers, to communicate with the Jewish deaf communities that they will eventually serve. [www.hebrewseminarydeaf.org]

There are several other organizations that offer a great deal of assistance for Jews who are deaf. They include the Jewish Deaf Resource Center [www. jdrc.org], Haazinu [www. haazinu.org], Britain's Jewish Deaf Association [www.jewishdeaf.org.uk] and the Association of the Deaf in Israel. [www. deaf .org.il/2.htm]

Many people will be familiar with Taglit-birthright Israel, which offers free trips to Israel to young adult Jews. Several of these trips cater to deaf Jews who are accompanied by professional interpreters and have the opportunity to meet with deaf Israelis. [www.njcd. org/birthright] Micah Brown describes his experience with birthright as "one of the most profoundly spiritual trips I've ever been on. It really made a major impact on my spiritual identity as a deaf Jew." [http://tiny url.com/ 32msrw]

Finding a soulmate can be tough enough for anyone. Many sites talk about additional challenges faced by Jewish people who are deaf. To address that need, Our Way organizes social events and maintains a Jewish Deaf Singles Registry. [http://tinyurl.com/ 2wlqfz]

It seems that Carolyn Ginsburg and Mark Stern were able to find each other without the assistance of the registry. They married last November, and the New York Times was at the ceremony, too. "Two interpreters who understand and can sign in both English and Hebrew stood at the ready," the Times' article said. "One was for the dozen or so guests who were deaf or hard of hearing. The other was for the bride and bridegroom, who were especially keen to take in the cantor's singing, which can be hard for them to make out because it often includes drawn-out syllables. 'We wanted to make sure we didn't miss anything,' Ms. Ginsburg said." [http:// tinyurl.com /2l9hzf]

MAKING SENSE OF INVESTING

Young couple tries to 'bring students closer to Judaism'

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Before they met, Eli and Shira Sack had lives that were, in some ways, mirror images.

"They are our teachers..."

Both born in April, a year apart, Eli, a native of Jerusalem, is the son of a Toronto-born mother, and Shira, a Toronto native, is the daughter of Israeli-born Dvora Shiderman, a former teacher at Eitz Chaim Day School.

Now married for four years and the parents of two-year-old Hila, the Sacks – who teach at Torah High in Vaughan – returned to Toronto from Israel two years ago.

Torah High is an after-school program affiliated with the Orthodox Union's National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY). It has seven locations in the GTA and is accredited by the Ontario Ministry of Education to give high school credits, including U-level credits that can be used as part of an Ontario university application.

Shira, 26, instituted Torah High's Hebrew-language studies two years ago to add another dimension to the school's Jewish studies program. She has been teaching Hebrew language to a Grade 9/10 class and an 11/12 class, and will teach a new program, visual art – with a Jewish approach – next year.

Eli, 25, has been teaching Torah and Jewish ethics to Grade 9 and 10 students for the past year.

Shira, who has a degree in special education with a minor in Jewish art from Bar-Ilan University, also teaches Hebrew and Navi (prophets) at the Dr. Abraham Shore She'arim Hebrew Day School. Eli, who worked in the technical support field in Israel, is studying computers at Seneca College.

Eli, whose English has only a trace of an accent (his father is also North American), said he likes to "be open, to listen, to understand where students are coming from."

He also likes to be "challenged with questions that these students have, and they usually have pretty good ones," he said.

The idea is to bring them closer to Judaism, Shira said.

Because of her formal teaching background, "in the beginning… I took a lot of advice" from Shira, said Eli. Also, he added, Torah High staff members were very supportive.

While Torah High is not Eli's first experience with non-Orthodox kids – he grew up playing soccer with them in his mixed neighbourhood in Jerusalem – he said non-Orthodox students at Torah High are different from their Israeli counterparts because they "don't live the Jewish culture, or the Israeli culture."

> A lesson from the teachers: "When you teach, you always need to start at the level the child is on, and move up from there," says Shira.
>
> "Every little bit is a lot," adds Eli, regarding his approach to Jewish practice. "I am happy with any step they take."

Teaching at Torah High, Eli also draws on his experience as the oldest of 10 children, and as a former youth group counsellor in Israel. He attended a Chabad Talmud Torah, but his parents were "kind of hippies" who affiliated with the Carlebach movement.

Shira is a graduate of Eitz Chaim and Ulpanat Orot who went to Israel after high school to study at Midreshet Lindenbaum (Brovenders), a Jerusalem seminary.

After a summer in Toronto, she returned to Israel on aliyah, and worked in a home for disabled children as part of Sherut Leumi (national service in lieu of army service) before entering university.

Although she had plans to study architecture, she realized during her Sherut Leumi stint that working with children gave her more satisfaction.

Eli and Shira met in Israel at a Shabbat meal for young, English-speaking singles when she was a first-year student at Bar-Ilan. He was studying at a hesder yeshiva, which combines Jewish study with army service, and was due to enter the army two weeks later. They were engaged within two months.

Shira and Eli Sack hold their two-year-old daughter Hila. [Frances Kraft photo]

Eli, whose interests include airplanes, music and cooking, enjoys teaching, but doesn't necessarily see it as a permanent career for himself.

However, he said, he "would probably look for something like NCSY and Torah High wherever I am" to share his love of Judaism with young people.

"They are our teachers…" will return at the end of September.

Together We Can Change the Course of History

The Community Town Hall Meeting on Inclusive Public Education

Our Jewish community stands at an historic crossroad in our four decade campaign to include faith-based schools, such as Jewish day schools, in the publicly funded education system.

Inclusive public education is important for everyone, whether or not you send your child to a Jewish day school.

Find out what's at stake and what you can do to change the course of history.

The Community Town Hall Meeting
Wednesday, July 4
7:00-8:30 p.m.
Leah Posluns Theatre, 4588 Bathurst St.

Inclusive public education will strengthen both faith-based schools and the public system.

Rabbi comes home to lead Oakville shul

By ADAM SEGAL
Special to The CJN

For Rabbi Stephen Wise, the famous phrase "there's no place like home" very much rings true.

After a two-year rabbinical stint in sunny Boca Raton, Fla., the Canadian boy is coming home to serve as the new rabbi of Shaarei-Beth El Congregation in Oakville.

"I couldn't be more excited," enthused the 33-year-old hockey aficionado, who starts his new position June 30.

"I'm looking forward to being in a community like Oakville where everyone knows your name."

Indeed, one of the biggest allures for Wise to return north of the border was the small, intimate congregation, which has about 125 member families and serves all of Halton Region.

Rabbi Stephen Wise

As well, with his wife Cheryl and three small children, Rabbi Wise is looking forward to having his Toronto-area family and friends close by.

Flush with fresh ideas, the Reform rabbi has many creative ideas for all demographic groups that he looks forward to putting into practice at Shaarei-Beth El.

"I plan to teach a class that I've been developing called 'The Hero Inside Each of Us,' for the post bnai mitzvah program," he said.

"It looks at Jewish heroes of the past and present and shows how people who don't have supernatural powers can still be heroic."

Another idea for adults, cleverly titled "Prophets on Bay Street," caters to the established professional crowd and invites them to learn with the charismatic rabbi.

From synagogue services to social events, Rabbi Wise is looking to nurture strong ties with the already tight knit group of congregants.

"I envision being part of this community where my own family will be intimately involved with the synagogue," he said.

Originally from Toronto, Wise attended Holy Blossom Temple while growing up.

After studying at the University of Toronto, he pursued post-graduate work in Jewish communal service at Brandeis University.

He was certain about working in the Jewish community, but the recent graduate hadn't yet found his eventual calling, so he decided to work as a youth educator at a synagogue in Massachusetts.

"I watched the rabbi working in that synagogue, who guided, prayed, taught and worked with kids and adults, and realized he was doing everything I love to do," Rabbi Wise recalled.

So the inspired soul went off to begin his rabbinic studies.

He was ordained by the Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in 2005 and has been one of three rabbis at Boca Raton's very large Temple Beth El ever since.

The sojourn in Florida was great preparation for his new role, Rabbi Wise said.

"I worked with a gifted speaker and rabbi, Dan Levin, who has been an incredible mentor," Rabbi Wise said.

"Any time I do anything from a sermon to a wedding, I sit with him to process it, and he's been an incredible guide."

Rabbi Wise said he knew almost immediately after meeting members of the Shaarei-Beth El community that it was time to come home.

"At the interview for the position, one of the guys started telling me about his backyard hockey rink," Rabbi Wise said.

"That's when I really felt at home."

Teens donate bar mitzvah gifts to new arts scholarship fund

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN

Using gifts from their bat mitzvahs, two 13-year-old Avenue Road Arts School students have raised $35,000 to launch a scholarship fund to help Toronto children attend art classes at high-quality institutions.

Ariella Minden and Dylan Kerdman both spoke last week at the opening of "460 Degrees of the Avenue Road Arts School," a show featuring works of adult students at the school, at the Women's Art Association Gallery.

"I realized that as I got older, when I started getting an allowance, that everything I did cost money, like art classes, guitars, instruments, art supplies," Dylan told The CJN.

"Underprivileged kids that can't afford that, who go to public schools that can't afford that, can't get [access to] a good art program," she added.

"So I decided for my bat mitzvah fund that I would take all my bat mitzvah gifts and put them towards this charity."

Said Ariella: "Tikkun olam means to repair the world, and I believe that if each of us does one little thing it will make a difference."

She added that she feels good about her positive impact on other children.

"I hope they'll improve in whatever they choose to do, whatever their interests are, and I hope they make many new friends and learn many new techniques."

The Avenue Road Arts School offers classes in music, writing, drama and visual arts to both children and adults.

While both are students at the school, the two girls raised funds independently and did not know each other.

Ariella and Dylan's bat mitzvahs were in November and January respectively, but the school just received charitable status three weeks ago, which allowed it to launch the fund.

Founding director Lola Rasminsky is putting together a board to look after it.

"I'm actually thinking of inviting the girls to join the board – I don't know what the legalities of that are," Rasminsky said. "I certainly want them to participate in how the scholarship program unfolds."

Rasminsky wants to hold a fall fundraising concert showcasing Toronto personalities who are also musicians, such as politician Bob Rae, architect Jack Diamond and Royal Ontario Museum CEO William Thorsell, to emphasize the importance of arts training.

Rasminsky wants to raise awareness about the importance of the arts, saying they make people smarter, improve self-confidence and help develop life skills.

Rae, a supporter of the school, also spoke at the show opening and echoed that sentiment.

"One of the terrible things that's happened in the last 15 years or so, there has developed a theory that the arts are some kind of a frill," he said.

"It's a terrible thing… there's all sorts of ways of understanding the world, [but] our school system only seems to understand one or two."

Jewish Mosaic Festival celebrates diversity

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Toronto is one of the world's most cosmopolitan cities, so it should come as no surprise to learn that the GTA's Jewish population, estimated at about 185,000, is also highly cosmopolitan and consists of a spectrum of nationalities.

The Jewish Mosaic Festival, a one-day series of events held last summer at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), allowed city-area residents to share and learn about the different customs of Jewish communities from countries including Argentina, Brazil, China, Czechoslovakia, India, Iraq, Jamaica, Mexico, Nigeria, Romania, Tunisia and Uruguay.

Representing some 22 countries, participants presented displays, talks, workshops, films and musical and dance performances. Equal parts education and entertainment, the festival drew more than 2,000 people.

"It was quite gratifying to be able to educate – I use the word advisedly, but it's a large part of what we were doing – to educate the larger Jewish community about the presence of various different cultural communities within Judaism," said Turkish-born architect Moiz Behar, who joined with others on a presentation on the history of the Jewish community of Turkey and the revival of the Judeo-Spanish language, Ladino.

Festival presenters "said they kept hearing the same remark: 'I didn't know there were any Jews in China,' or Bolivia, Barbados, or Turkey, you fill in the blank," Behar said.

Something exciting and effervescent happens when you bring Jews from different national backgrounds together, said Janet Klein Slavin, the BJCC official who organized the first festival and is now planning a sequel for the BJCC and its partner agencies – namely, JIAS Toronto, Beth Hatefutsoth, Miles Nadal JCC, Schwartz/Reisman Centre, Latner Centre for Jewish Knowledge and Heritage, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto and the Koffler Centre of the Arts.

"The Jewish community is generally very well-educated, but there is still a lack of knowledge about the variety of Jewish cultures within it," she said.

Laura Rosemblit, whose husband's family is from Bolivia and who lived there briefly, has volunteered to help represent Bolivia in the next festival, scheduled for June 1, 2008.

"In La Paz they founded two different synagogues, one for the Polish and one for the Germans," she said, engendering knowing smiles among her listeners. Splinterization of the Jewish community along cultural lines is common, no matter where you're from.

So that the festival may represent as many countries of origin as possible, organizers are seeking volunteers to act as country representatives. "We want the programming to have an authentic international flair," Klein Slavin said.

A planning meeting is scheduled for July 10 at 7 p.m. For further details, please contact Klein Slavin at 416-636-1880, ext. 259, or visit the Jewish Mosaic Festival website at www.jewishmosaicfestival.com.

Dvira Ovadia

Toronto designer battles for top prize on reality show

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

She's got a degree in architecture, diplomas in technical design and a master's degree in interior design, but nothing could have prepared her for this competition.

Dvira Ovadia, the only Jewish contestant on the second season of design icon Debbie Travis' show called From the Ground Up, spent several weeks last fall battling 13 other contestants on national television for the coveted title of the new chief designer for Travis' line of design condos and homes.

Whether she was asked to design a fun yet functional cabin for summer campers, or create a chandelier for a hip, new restaurant, Ovadia had to be on her toes and work under immense pressure.

"It is not very often that someone throws a bunch of tasks at you, and you have to do it because you put yourself in this situation and everyone is watching you. You have the pressure, and on top of that you have the pressure of coming up with something usually within minutes, not even hours," Ovadia said, adding that they would have just two days or less to complete a task and could only work from 9 a.m. until 9 p.m.

Israeli-born Ovadia, 27, grew up in Brussels before she settled in Thornhill. While the city she calls home changed a few times, her desire to work in the design world remained constant.

"Growing up, as a child, I always wanted to do something in design. I was always very creative. Whether it was fashion or design or product design, it was something I knew I really wanted to do," she said.

Having an Israeli mother and an Egyptian father, and having travelled the world, Ovadia said that being exposed to so many different cultures has shaped her own style.

"I definitely have a diverse cultural style, and I think that helps me a lot, because my mind is very open to mixing things... It has definitely influenced my design, who I am, how I think and how I analyze."

When Ovadia's fiancé found out about the show, he urged her to apply.

"I hesitated at first, but I read up about it and I'd seen a few episodes of the first season, so I decided that I would take on the opportunity and apply for it. Before I knew it, I was accepted," she said, adding that she had to resign from her position at Munge/Leung Design Associates to participate in the competition.

Although it was impossible for Ovadia and any of the other contestants to know what to expect, the biggest surprise was how well she was able to cope with the pressure of thinking on her feet.

"The tasks... were very unusual, and they weren't the conventional kind of tasks. It wasn't like, 'Here's a room, now go decorate it.' It was really about thinking outside of the box, being innovative and being able to come up with designs and ideas on the fly because there is no time. Somehow you have to pull it out of yourself, and it amazed me that I was able to come up with stuff so quickly," Ovadia said.

She said that it was physically and emotionally draining, but most of all, it was a great learning experience.

"Debbie made me realize that innovation and cleverness is the key to design and that's what she preaches... What I learned is that you have to make something out of nothing," she said, referring to her task in Episode 2, where she had to design a cabin using nothing but materials that were laying around the camp site.

"I think it made me stronger. I realized that I'm so much more capable than I ever thought I was, and I realize that if you want something you have to go out and get it... It gave me a deeper perspective in life."

She said that since the first few episodes have aired on Global Television, she has received a number of job offers.

"I've had a lot of job opportunities and a lot of people have contacted me. I guess people realize that there are only 14 people that were selected across Canada from thousands, and I guess that puts me up there and gives me more exposure within my industry. I have had a few job offers, but I'm trying to wait it out and see what's going to happen."

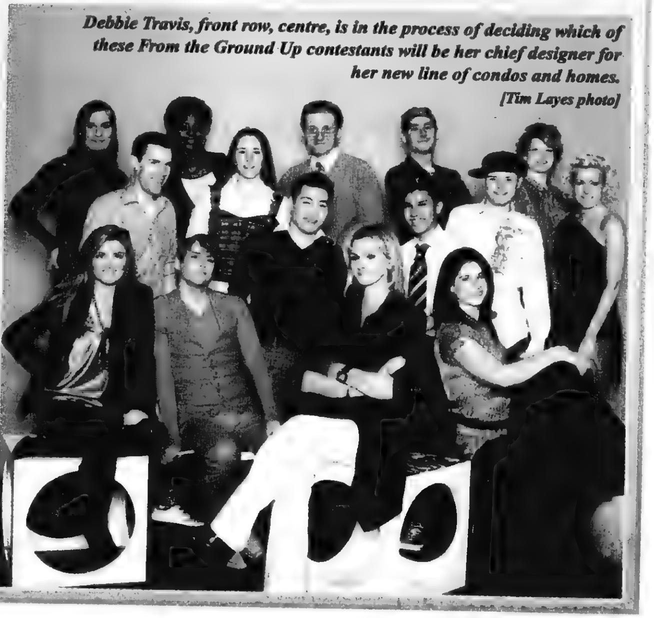
She said that no matter where she ends up, she hopes that she'll be in a position to reach the masses and make design accessible to everyone.

"I think that everybody in this world is starting to get a little more design conscious... I'd like to develop a philosophy that will be able to help the general public, for those who don't have a lot of money, but do want to have something unique in their house."

Ovadia said that she couldn't have gotten to where she is today without the support of her friends and family.

"My parents have always been extremely supportive. That might be the backbone of everything... Just to know that all my loved ones are behind me and are supporting me in everything that I do, it is definitely a big help."

Find out how Ovadia does in the competion by watching From The Ground Up on Global TV Thursdays at 9 p.m.



Debbie Travis, front row, centre, is in the process of deciding which of these From the Ground Up contestants will be her chief designer for her new line of condos and homes.

Coverage of PA strife sideswipes Israel

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

The Canadian and international media have devoted a lot of attention to the recent violence between Hamas and Fatah, which resulted in a division of rule in Gaza and the West Bank, respectively.

While no single theme dominated the coverage, some journalists tended to blame the internal Palestinian strife on Israel. They were sure to mention that even though Israel withdrew from Gaza in 2005, it still controls the airspace and sea routes, and thus, in effect, still occupies this so-called "open-air prison."

Another common point was that Israel, the United States and Canada (with Europe mentioned occasionally) refused to accept the outcome of the democratic elections in which Hamas gained control of the Palestinian Authority. Thus, by withholding funding from the PA and trying to diplomatically isolate Hamas, these western powers bear much of the responsibility for the situation in Gaza.

For example, in "Breaking point in the Middle East" (BBC online, June 15), Jeremy Bower wrote that the West's economic sanctions "caused severe hardship and helped fuel the violence in Gaza by making the people even more desperate."

Like many others, Bower ignored the fact that according to the International Monetary Fund and the United Nations, aid to Gaza amounted to $1.2 billion (US) in 2006, up from $1 billion in 2005. These funds were channelled through UN agencies and NGOs to help the Palestinian people directly.

A more accurate and appropriate response was the Toronto Star editorial, "Speed Palestinian aid" (June 20). The Star called on Canada to join international efforts to alleviate Palestinian suffering while avoiding any support for the "Hamas regime."

In two key paragraphs, the Star writes: "A Canadian response that generously supports [Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud] Abbas without abandoning Gazans is the best way [to] reinforce the message that Palestinians stand to gain by embracing leaders who are prepared to make peace.

"Palestinians who handed Hamas control of parliament in last year's election are bitter at the international community's refusal to deal with Hamas leaders, or to provide aid. Palestinians spurned Abbas' Fatah camp for its corruption and inefficiency, believing Hamas would deliver good government and better services. But Hamas also envisages 'obliterating' Israel. While Palestinians are entitled to elect whoever they choose, nothing compels the international community to support regimes that threaten the peace."

* * *

The June 14 On the Map with Avi Lewis (on CBC Newsworld) promised an inside look at the conflicts in Lebanon and Gaza, beyond what had been "packaged," Lewis claimed, for "the North American news machine."

In what Lewis said was an effort to "cool the hype" and sensationalism of mainstream news, he interviewed Beirut-based Alistair Crooke, a former British intelligence officer and now co-head of the Conflicts Forum.

Crooke said that what was "really" going on in Gaza was simply Hamas' effort to counter one of Fatah's major security services, not to defeat Fatah as a whole. He also argued that, contrary to what even a great many Lebanese think, it is "irrational" to believe that Syria was responsible for the June 13 assassination of anti-Syrian Lebanese MP Walid Eido. Why? Because, according to Crooke, Syria has been courting better ties with the United States and Israel in order to end its isolation.

Lewis did note that Crooke has long advocated engagement with Hamas. But he failed to point out that many experts view Crooke as an apologist for Iran, Syria, Hezbollah and Hamas. For instance, Crooke maintained with Lewis that what Hamas wants is (only) security and "tranquility" in Gaza and the West Bank, and he has even argued elsewhere (in Asia Times) that Hamas is interested in promoting democracy throughout the region.

But what about the violence and terrorism for which Hamas is otherwise well known? Well, Lewis might also have shown viewers the banner on Crooke's own Conflicts Forum website, which reads: "Listening to political Islam, recognizing resistance."

Paul Michaels is communications director of the Canada-Israel Committee.

STARS AT BAYCREST: NHL alumni Mike Pelyk, left, and Mark Napier met Millie Stein on June 20 at Baycrest's annual general meeting. Stein, who has Alzheimer's disease and lives at Baycrest's Apotex Centre, Jewish Home for the Aged, enjoyed receiving an autographed puck and Baycrest Pro-Am sweater from the two hockey players. Pelyk and Napier each received a Baycrest Chairs Proud Partners Award for their leadership of the fundraising hockey tournament which supports Alzheimer's research. This year's Baycrest Pro-Am saw 39 teams raise $2 million dollars. Next year's tournament is close to being sold out with 56 registered teams and a fundraising goal of over $3M.

Requests take time to get through the courts

Family Matters

Question. I want to vary my child support payments, as my income has dropped because I moved into my investment property and lost rental income because of my separation.

Also, my son has moved in with me as he could not bear to live in the matrimonial home any longer and he is still attending high school.

I have retained a lawyer to vary my support but he has taken three months to do what I consider basically nothing other than sending e-mails, reviewing files, photocopies, courier services and instructing other associates.

They wanted a $4,000 binder and have just sent me another bill for $575 to "replenish the trust account." Should it take so long to accomplish a basic variation in child support? And secondly, why do I have to go through such an expense and long period of time to accomplish this? Who knows.

This is taking so long that by the time litigation ends either my financial situation or hers might change again. Then I may have start all over again with yet another variation application!

Answer. Without reviewing your file, I cannot comment on your case or whether your lawyer is handling it expeditiously. But it sounds like your expectation of costs and the timing of results was fashioned either by a lack of knowledge or a failure by your lawyer to explain the reality of the Ontario court system, its methods, limitations, paperwork and process.

First, it is quite normal for it to take at least three months before a client suing for a change in a child or spousal support court order can see a judge to discuss their case at something called a "case conference."

The courts are simply overwhelmed and there is a severe shortage of judges.

Prior to such a conference, which takes the form of a settlement meeting, each of your lawyers prepares detailed court briefs comprised of family law financial statements, showing budgets and asset/liability calculations. They also attach three years of tax returns/notices of assessments.

Your lawyer might also prepare a detailed list of questions for the other party to answer, asking for such documents as credit card statements, bank statements or past credit applications for car lease or mortgage applications to uncover someone's "real" income or assets.

If there is a private pension, it has to be valuated as to its current value. I cannot comment on whether $4000 was appropriate to charge on your file, but preparation is costly if you want a good result.

DAVE STEIN, TAGLIT-BIRTHRIGHT ISRAEL'S 10,000TH TORONTO PARTICIPANT

Over 10,000 Torontonians have taken the trip of a lifetime

Since the inception of Taglit-birthright israel in 1999 over 130,000 young adults aged 18 to 26 - including 10,000 from Toronto - have traveled on this unique and exciting ten day, educational trip to Israel. The birthright israel initiative - funded by the Government of Israel, Jewish communities around the world including UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, and private philanthropists - continues to positively impact the lives of our future Jewish leaders.

Taglit-birthright israel's co-founders, Charles Bronfman and Michael Steinhardt, created the program in order to send young Jewish adults from around the world to Israel - for no charge - to connect them with their Jewish identity and the State of Israel; strengthen solidarity among Jews worldwide; and ensure that Jewish traditions and Jewish heritage continue throughout the 21st Century.

"Those ten days spent in Israel gave me a lot of what I had unknowingly been searching for," says past birthright participant Leah White. "Growing up, I attended Hebrew day school, and participated in activities through a youth organization and my synagogue. While I had all the tools, I really was lost when it came to using them and bringing them all together as I begin my life as a young adult. And then I was given the gift of birthright israel."

Taglit-birthright israel alumni are emerging as leaders on university campuses and in Jewish life in general. At UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, the majority of young adults involved in community life are alumni, and in fact, many even serve as madrichim (counselors) on current trips - taking time off from work and school to pass on their passion and knowledge to the current crop of birthright participants.

In the past 12 months, there have been nearly 50,000 birthright israel applicants from North America alone. However, only 29,000 will be able to participate due to funding limitations. "We are working to significantly increase fundraising in the community for Taglit-birthright israel," says Michael Bregman, Chair of the birthright israel Foundation Canada. "Additional funds are needed to reduce the wait list and ensure that all young adults can claim their birthright in a timely fashion."

To invest in the future of Jewish life by making a gift to Taglit-birthright israel, please contact Andrea Freedman at 416.631.5819 or by email at: afreedman@ujafed.org

Thornhill couple's birthright babies

What do you get when you send thousands of Jewish young adults to Israel together? Jewish children who will one day hopefully follow in their parents' footsteps.

Boaz and Esther Willinger are one of a number of couples who met through Taglit birthright-israel and have since started families.

Married within a year of their December 2001 trip, the Thornhill residents are now parents to a 21-month-old daughter named appropriately enough, Aliya, and a son, Ethan, who is almost three months old.

Taglit-birthright israel "really did change the direction of my life," says Boaz. "I grew up in St. Catharines, a small town with few opportunities to meet Jewish girls. Then I went to Israel and met Esther, and now we have a family and are raising our kids in a Jewish home."

The Willingers are "involved with the Sephardic Kehila Centre, with which Esther's family has strong ties to, and Chabad at Flamingo," he continues. "Aliya, who will be starting nursery next year at Chabad, watches Oy Baby DVDs, which is a sort of Jewish Baby Einstein, and says 'shabbat shalom.' When we light the shabbat candles and my wife covers her eyes, Aliya covers her eyes."

In some ways, the Willingers' life in Thornhill seems worlds apart from the disco dance boat on the Kinneret where they first met, but both are part of this story of Jewish continuity.

"Although I'd gone to Jewish schools and had Jewish friends, I wasn't meeting other Jewish people at that point in my life," remembers Esther, of the social opportunity Taglit birthright-israel offered her. "Like a lot of people in the age group that the trip caters to, I was in university and working and had already developed my circle of friends. If I hadn't gone to Israel, I don't know how - or if - I would have met Boaz. Taglit birthright-israel gives you an opportunity to connect with other Jews in a Jewish environment. We met and as a result were able to bring more Jewish people into the world."

Toronto Taglit-birthright israel by the numbers

There's no way numbers or statistics can tell the emotional and life-changing story that is Taglit-birthright israel. Still, looking back since its launch in December 1999, some of the numbers behind the ten day educational experience are awe-inspiring. So far, more than 130,000 young Jewish adults world-wide have received this gift of a lifetime, a gift that not only connects participants to Israel, but creates lifelong friendships, relationships and our community's future Jewish leaders.

On June 5th, over 600 students and young adults on birthright israel programs took part in a unique gala event planned by Canada Israel Experience (CIE) in memory of Andy Bronfman. Andy, the late wife of co-birthright founder Charles Bronfman who passed away following a tragic accident just over a year ago, was committed to strengthening Jewish identity and invoking values of leadership, tzedaka, and tikun olam. Bronfman was particularly passionate about and committed to Jewish youth, the arts, education, and, of course, birthright israel.

The event, made possible by a generous gift by Toronto's Sydney and Florence Cooper, commemorated Andy by celebrating her love of the arts. Hosted by Mini Israel, in addition to viewing the models of the country, participants created art projects at various stations and workshops set up throughout the site. In a letter from the Coopers read by Lorne Klemensberg, director of CIE and emcee of the event, the Coopers welcomed all the birthright participants from Canada and North America.

A DAY FROM THE BIRTHRIGHT DIARY OF DAVE STEIN

6:30AM – The phone rang with our wake up call. Although I was really tired from yesterday, I eagerly got up to start another new and exciting day.

7:15AM – Breakfast today was great as usual. The Kibbutz served a typical Israeli breakfast with vegetables, breads, cheeses, yogurts and fruits. The food in this country is so good. I eat enough at breakfast to last a full day!

9:00AM – We got off the bus on top of Mt. Arbel. What an amazing view! This hike was remarkable. After all the learning it was break time! Having studied art in school, I felt especially connected to Tzfat, which is known for being an artist's heaven. With the rest of my free time, I ate lunch and did some shopping. I was determined to get 5 Mezuzahs as a wedding gift for my sister. I knew they'd be extra special for her if she knew they were not only from Israel but from Tzfat.

3:00PM – We arrived at the Jordan River to go rafting. It was marvelous. We had 7 people in our boat and floated down the river with a boat on either side of us each filled with 2 soldiers. This was a great end to our activities of the day because it gave us a chance to cool off in the water.

5:30PM – At 5:30PM we arrived back at the Kibbutz for our Shabbat preparations.

6:30PM – We all met and did Kiddush together. We then discussed the meaning of wine and challah and talked about how we can make Shabbat our own. Shabbat on Taglit-Birthright Israel was very special for me because at this point we had already been together for 8 days and were like family. Celebrating Shabbat in Israel with 40 new friends, 2 madrichim, 9 soldiers and a guide is just so special. It's not something you can really explain with words but something you feel in your heart.

10:00PM – A huge party unexpectedly erupted in the kibbutz. The kibbutz was celebrating all the people who had lived there their entire lives. There were over 1,000 people there and being able to join in and dance and talk with the kibbutzniks was wonderful. Even people who no longer lived on the Kibbutz came out to this party.

What a great time! This has truly been an incredible day. But, boy, I have to get some sleep now!

MICHAEL BREGMAN
"Birthright is an immensely valuable program that creates an everlasting bond between young Jews and Israel. The resultant pride of association will help build a new generation of Jewish leaders who contribute positively to all aspects of society."

TONY COHEN
The impact birthright israel has on young adults is so profound and life-changing that it is crucial for the next generation. People should support birthright because the responsibility for the future of the Jewish people should not be solely on the shoulders of a few – it is our community's responsibility.

KAREN MORTON - "Having been involved with birthright from the beginning, it's hard to express the pride I feel today from seeing all that it has become. I suppose it's not unlike a proud mother who has watched her baby grow from an infant to an important and respected member of the Jewish community just like birthright israel. I couldn't be more proud."

Hillel sends aid mission to Africa and Israel

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Within the past two years, Hillel of Greater Toronto has organized volunteer trips to Israel, El Salvador, Honduras and Nicaragua, and it's just expanded its travel portfolio to Uganda.

Devora Schwartz Waxman and 10 students from Ryerson University, York University and the University of Toronto took part in a volunteer mission to Israel and Africa last month to give a helping hand to communities in need.

The trip was organized by the American Jewish World Service (AJWS), a group that funds non-governmental organizations that work to alleviate poverty and disease in developing countries.

The month-long trip was divided evenly between Kiryat Moshe, Israel – where students worked on renovating an old building used by the Ethiopian community as a community centre and worked with youth at an after-school centre – and a town in Uganda called Tororo, where students helped build a new school house.

Waxman said it's the first time AJWS has sent a delegation of students to Uganda, despite the fact AJWS has been working with the Uganda Orphans Rural Development Program (UORDP) for three years.

UORDP works with children who have been orphaned, primarily by AIDS and other diseases, and provides services such as health care and education.

"Our work project was to build another school house on an existing school site. The school is a very poor school, and they have a lot of orphans and children who come from very poor homes, and they're in a particularly impoverished area," Waxman said.

The delegation stayed with the UORDP director, who has a compound where he built guest quarters. Although the students didn't have electricity or running water, Waxman said it was a great experience to live in the community and hand-wash their own clothes and draw water from a well.

"What was really interesting was that part of the fees that we paid to come on this trip helped pay for the school house. It was a really nice feeling to know that even if we didn't contribute so much to the work, we still enabled this community to have another school house," Waxman said.

The delegation also had an opportunity to visit classes at the existing school to speak to students about life in Canada.

"We talked to them about the fact that we are Jews and what that means. They were very fascinated by the fact that we were Jewish," she said, adding that many of the children had never left their towns, so meeting white people was something that was very unusual for them.

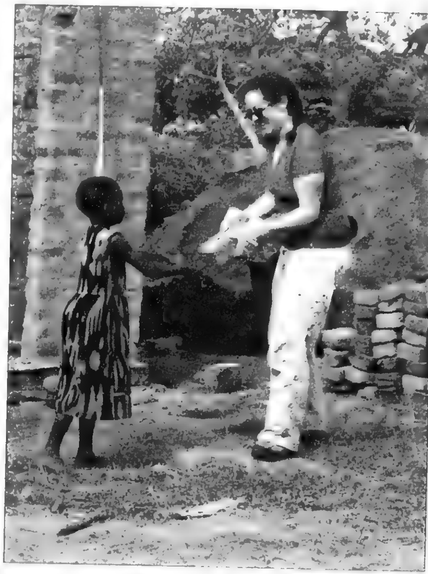
"Some of the little babies would see us and start crying because they thought we were ghosts," Waxman recalled.

Trip participant Orlee-Rose Strauss spearheaded a project to paint a mural of a map of the world on one of the existing school houses.

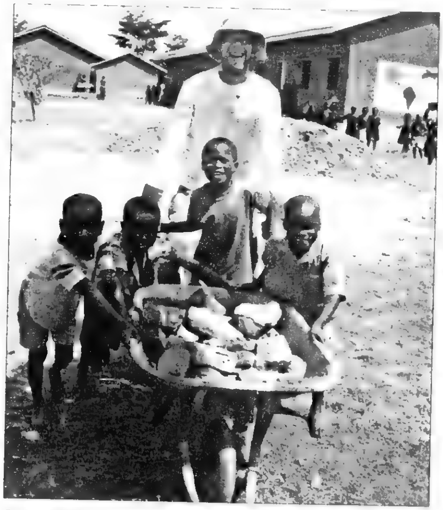
"On the mural, Toronto and Tororo were labeled to show the children where we had come from and where they live in the world," said David Gordon, 22, a fourth-year global political studies student at York who went on the trip.

"They were so excited about this mural project that the day we started, the whole community came out to see what we were doing. Every time we turned around, there were more people there to see what we were up to," Waxman said.

"It was a really interesting side of Africa that I didn't know. People are really happy. Yes, there is AIDS and illness and sickness, but they're very happy people and so genuinely hospitable. We were so warmly welcomed."



Rachel Levy, another trip participant, works with a local child who is eager to help build the schoolhouse.



Local children in Tororo, Uganda, give David Gordon a helping hand while he transports bricks to be used to build a new school.

After spending two weeks with the community of Tororo, the group headed to Israel to work with the Ethiopian community in Kiryat Moshe, while families in Rehovot opened their homes to give the delegation a place to sleep.

"The municipality in Kiryat Moshe gave the community an old, dilapidated building that they could use for community events and simchahs and meetings. They are in the process of redoing it and renovating it, and so we worked on that building for a few days, and we also worked at an after-school centre for troubled youth," Waxman said.

Gordon recalled a conversation he had with a group of Ethiopians his own age who are living in Kiryat Moshe.

He said that they has asked him questions about his life in Toronto, and one asked, "Can I come with you back to Toronto?"

"Upon hearing the last question, I said, 'Why would you would want to come back to Toronto? You are living in Medinat Yisrael.' In a sarcastic voice, one of them responded, 'Oh, yeah. Medinat Yisrael. Would you live here?'

"Hearing first-hand how Ethiopian residents feel about Israel motivated me even more to help the community in any way which would assist them in creating the life they deserve in Israel," Gordon said.

"Those that live in difficult situations can have a very negative view of the world. Yet, their mindset can change once they see that there are people who are willing to help make their lives better."

BONDING WITH ISRAEL: Bialik Grade 7 students took part as a grade in the Bonding with Israel Program, in which families contributed towards the purchase of Israel Bonds instead of buying individual bar and bat mitzvah gifts. This year's class raised $85,000 and also contributed a portion of the proceeds to three charities chosen by the students. Pictured, from left, are Raquel Savatti and Laura Orzy of Israel Bonds, Grade 7 student council representatives Shira Segal and Maya Stein, parent co-ordinators Susan Tobin and Rosemary Greisman, and student council representative Kyle Ludmer.

שישאר בינינו

גידי קורן וחברים

מה יהיה

ימים של קורת רוח יחסית לאוהבי ישראל.

נשיא המדינה הנבחר משכמו ומעלה, חתן פרס נובל, איש שיוכל להוציא את המוסד הזה מהבוץ המביך של משה קצב.

אדמה משוגעת (Sweet Mud)

חרם המרצים הבריטי-

Vigil held in support of Val David chassidic community

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — About 40 people showed up for a vigil to show solidarity with the Satmar chassidic community that summers in Val David where two homes were destroyed by three deliberately set fires this month.

The event was the personal initiative of David Birnbaum, executive director of the Quebec English School Boards Association, who was executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, for five years until September 2004. He said he felt it was important for Quebecers to publicly deplore the arsons. The latest took place in the wee hours of June 17.

Birnbaum sent notices to every federal member of Parliament from Quebec, member of the national assembly and Montreal city councillor, as well as union and community organization leaders, and was disappointed by the lack of response.

Only Mile End borough councillor Eleni Fakotakis, who was asked by Mayor Gerald Tremblay to represent the city, and Cote St. Luc councillor Dida Berku attended. Also present was Guy Bouthillier, former president of the St. Jean Baptiste Society.

The provincial police, the Sûreté du Québec (SQ), have not labelled the fires hate crimes for lack of concrete evidence, but members of the Satmar community say they feel targeted because of who they are, and Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) said that, after three arsons within two weeks, anti-Semitism has to be suspected. The police are looking into two other recent arsons in the area, of commercial properties not owned by Jews.

The vigil took place across the street from the Satmar Congregation Yetev Lev on Hutchison Street at St. Viateur Street.

The congregants stayed away from the vigil and avoided the media. The congregation issued a press release expressing gratitude to Val David Mayor Pierre Lapointe and his council "for their continuous support through all our hardships, and for their encouragement to restore our lives in our community."

The release also thanked the SQ for its continuing investigation. "We fully trust their professional work in restoring security to our community."

Alex Werzberger, president of the Coalition of Chassidic Organizations of Outremont and a congregation member, told The CJN the community prefers not to draw attention to itself and did not want it to be thought that it organized the event, which might be interpreted as a criticism of the authorities.

"The thinking is, rightly or wrongly, 'Let's be quiet, maybe it will die out and go away.'"

Werzberger is confident the police are taking the incidents seriously, and he was pleasantly surprised to receive a long letter – in English – from the SQ, reassuring the community that it is dedicating the necessary resources to the case.

"They are definitely not ignoring it. The pressure on them is big. This story has made the international media," he said.

Birnbaum said he had checked with three Satmar leaders in advance, and only one objected to the vigil.

The congregation has been in the media spotlight in the past year after it requested that the Park Avenue YMCA cover windows that are in view of the synagogue's rear windows.

Several chassidic women passing by the vigil stopped to ask what it was about and expressed appreciation for the gesture. One said it was her neighbour in Montreal who had lost a house, and another that she has sent her son to spend the summer in Val David with a sense of uneasiness.

Rabbi Reuben Poupko, co-chair of the Jewish community's security co-ordinating committee, blamed the arsons on the "antagonistic climate" for Jews in the wake of the "reasonable accommodation" debate.

"While I don't believe Quebec is any more anti-Semitic than anywhere else in North America, the silence from our political leaders, mainstream media and all good people has signalled to the bad people that it's fair game to attack Jews."

Nearby resident Stéphane Gelinas came to the vigil because he is fed up with what he sees as growing prejudice against Jews. "Enough is enough. In the last few years, I have witnessed too many actions against the Jewish people in Quebec. People are hypocrites to say the opposite.

"Whatever I talk to people about – politics, the economy, sports – the end of the conversation is always about Jews, that there's too many of them," said Gelinas, 44, who is originally from Ste. Agathe, near Val David.

Evie Applebee of Chomedey took part because "it's the least we can do. I believe it was anti-Semitism and I'm very disturbed… They are a small community that is alone and needs our help."

There is no doubt in André Zoldan's mind that the arsons are hate-motivated. "I think the climate in Quebec is deteriorating. And I'm afraid one act of boldness will encourage others to try it, and our leaders are not standing up and condemning it," said the Hampstead resident.

Werzberger said the 50 or 60 families who vacation in the Val David enclave are anxious, but it will not dissuade them from going back this summer. "The fear is not so much about personal safety. We don't think anyone will attack while we are there, but what about after September when everyone leaves. Will there still be a house standing after the eight or nine months that the place is empty?"

Mayor Lapointe told The CJN that he is trying to dispel misconceptions about the Chassidim among the town's 4,500 citizens, especially the children. "They have lived in the area since the 1940s, longer than a lot of the people here. They are not going to change their insularity or their beliefs. But they are a peaceful people."

He said the worst complaint the town has received about the Chassidim is related to littering, and the community has tried to address it.

Preventing crime is a problem for the area because of limited policing in the Laurentians, he noted. "The villages feel very, very neglected. At night, only two cars are on patrol in 20 villages."

A $5,000 reward from an anonymous businessman is offered through the Sun Youth Organization for information leading to arrest and conviction in the arsons.

Anyone with information is asked to call the SQ at 1-800-659-4264.

University's first Jewish president has big plans

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Harvey Weingarten, the Montreal-born president and vice-chancellor of the University of Calgary, is working overtime to ensure that his major initiatives are carried forth to fruition.

Since becoming its first Jewish president almost six years ago, Weingarten, 54, has taken steps to enhance the student experience, launched a $1.5 billion capital expansion plan and accelerated the pace of research.

A psychologist who was previously dean of McMaster University's faculty of science, he introduced these initiatives to catapult the University of Calgary into a world-class institution.

As he suggested in an interview during a brief visit to Toronto recently, he hews to a strategic approach to learning.

"The work of Canadian universities is critical to the social and economic health of Canada," he observed. "The challenge is to make sure that the academic programs we provide are constantly evolving to meet the current and future needs of our students and the public."

Weingarten strongly believes that students are entitled to a "contemporary, relevant and useful education" that prepares them for the real world.

This objective is achieved by means of two separate but related methods, he explained.

First, academic programs are increasingly based on "experiential" learning – co-op education, internships, study overseas and mentorships with leading scholars. Second, these programs foster analytical skills, intellectual curiosity, adaptability, communication and teamwork.

No ivory tower type, Weingarten maintains constant contact with student leaders so that he does not lose touch with realities on campus.

Harvey Weingarten

"They can tell me anything they want. The good, the bad, the ugly."

He supplements these meetings by random talks with students. "I enjoy these encounters," said Weingarten, who still gives occasional lectures.

At present, the student body numbers 28,000, but the demand for more places is growing. Hence the four new projects that will make room for an additional 7,000 students by 2010.

Thanks to government funding, the university will have a new digital library, a health research centre, a health sciences program, a faculty for veterinary medicine and a child development centre. In addition, new schools of business and engineering will be built.

"We are constructing new buildings and refurbishing old ones so that our students can study in cutting-edge facilities," he said.

His biggest challenges are three-fold: to set strategic directions, hire the right people to implement plans and find the necessary financial resources.

A typical day for Weingarten, a burly bear of a man, begins at 7 a.m. and rarely ends before 6 p.m.

"I work in a very fast-paced environment. Business is done by a handshake, though lawyers still get involved. I quite enjoy that."

The pace is faster than at McMaster. Weingarten, a McGill graduate, joined McMaster in 1979 after finishing post-graduate degrees at Yale.

It never occurred to him that he might be president of a university one day. "They – the University of Calgary – approached me to apply for the job. It never entered my mind."

As he tells it, he was surprised to be chosen as its seventh president. He signed a seven-year contract, and earlier this year, it was extended by three years. "My job has been an adventure, and very satisfying."

His Jewish background was not an issue when he applied for the presidency, saying that the rival University of Alberta was headed by a Jew, Myer Horowitz, in the 1980s.

Weingarten has no idea what he'll do after Calgary. "I don't know where I'll be in five years from now. I'm not making any predictions."

But he is certain that he will not go back to being a researcher. Weingarten specialized in the psychological and biological controls of eating and eating disorders, and his research activities were supported by grants.

For all intents and purposes, he stopped being a researcher when administrative duties at McMaster made that impossible.

Weingarten, however, remains a researcher at heart. "I have scholarly interests in education and public policy issues."

Weingarten is reluctant to discuss his private life, but he offered some tidbits.

His father was a pharmacist, and Weingarten grew up in the Montreal suburb of St. Laurent and studied at the Hebrew Academy in Outremont

He and his wife, who is not an academic, have two daughters, one of whom is a university student.

Asked to list his interests outside academia, he said, "I cycle. It's very outdoorsy, and I'm trying to be outdoorsy. I also watch TV and see friends and family."

In summing up his presidency, he concluded, "It's been an interesting adventure. The West is an interesting and different place. I now have a greater appreciation of Canada's diversity and I'm grateful for that."

Ahenakew appeal begins

Has the rehabilitation of disgraced native leader David Ahenakew begun?

Last week, as the Saskatchewan Court of Appeal considered a Crown request that it overrule a lower court's reversal of his conviction for promoting hate, news organizations in Saskatchewan reported that Ahenakew recently served on a task force associated with the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations.

Though a federation spokesperson would not comment, Jim Sinclair told Canadian Press he and Ahenakew had been asked to join the task force because of their knowledge of treaties and the Canadian constitution.

In March, meanwhile, the federation asked its senate to see if an individual could be reinstated. The native organization had stripped Ahenakew of his senate position following his comments attacking Jews at a December 2002 meeting of the federation.

Ahenakew, who once headed the Assembly of First Nations, was charged with promoting hatred of Jews, convicted and fined $1,000. Evidence showed that in an interview with a reporter, Ahenakew expanded on his remarks to the federation in which he blamed Jews for World War II. In the interview, he called Jews a disease and said Hitler was justified in murdering six million of them.

He was subsequently removed as a member of the Order of Canada.

His conviction was overturned when Judge Robert Laing of Court of Queen's Bench ruled the trial judge did not adequately assess whether Ahenakew actually intended to promote hate. He noted that Ahenakew's initial remarks prompted a local reporter to seek an interview and his hateful remarks were then uttered spontaneously in response to questions.

In court last week, Crown prosecutor Dean Sinclair argued Ahenakew knew he was talking to a journalist and that his comments would be reported. Theirs was not a private conversation, he stated.

B'nai Brith Canada, which has intervenor status, argued the court should consider the content of Ahenakew's statement and that there need not be repetition of the comments to show intent.

Outside the court, Ahenakew blasted the proceeding as a "farce," complained about the injustices done to native people, and called himself a victim.

Bernie Farber, CEO of Canadian Jewish Congress, said the inclusion of Ahenakew in the federation's task force "is a huge mistake. It sends exactly the wrong message, especially to young people."

Cape Breton students write poetry about Shoah

By JOEL JACOBSON
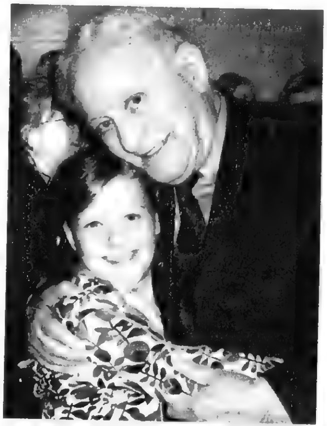
Atlantic Correspondent



Toronto businessman and Holocaust survivor Joseph Tenenbaum hugs Brianna Stubbert, a Grade 6 student at Brookland Elementary School in Sydney, N.S., after he spoke to her class and their families.

HALIFAX — Alaura Moore, a Grade 6 student at Brookland Elementary School in Sydney, N.S., read the following words, which she wrote herself, before an overflow crowd of more than 125 students, parents, educators and members of the Cape Breton Jewish community.

"I can run from my fears/ I can run from my tears/ Yes, it is true that I run very fast/ But it is also true that I am a Jew/ And there is no running from the Holocaust."

Listening intently to the poem with tears in his eyes and pride in his heart was Joseph Tenenbaum of Toronto, a Holocaust survivor.

He was hearing young people, none of them Jewish, read poetry they composed after studying the Holocaust over the last few months with teacher Kevin Linden.

Tenenbaum, now a successful businessman, flew to Sydney at his own expense to speak to these students, to further their understanding of the Holocaust and what it did to him, what it meant to him, and even how it turned him into a man who can forgive.

"Even though I was stripped of my home, my family, my town, my name, of my belongings, and left naked to be no longer human, just a number, like an item in an auction that no one wanted to bid on, the Nazis couldn't strip me of my dignity," he said, his voice cracking as many members of the audience wiped tears from their eyes.

"What you have done [in studying the Holocaust and writing poetry about it] is indescribable and very magnanimous," he told the children.

With support from the Jewish Community of Cape Breton, the Atlantic Jewish Council, the Cape Breton-Victoria Regional School Board, and the Nova Scotia Teachers Union, three teachers – Linden, Diane Lewis and Lynn Crawford – attended a three-week seminar at Yad Vashem in Jerusalem last summer. They were instilled with the enthusiasm to teach Holocaust education to their students, to keep the story alive as the number of survivors, and the Jewish population of Cape Breton, continues to dwindle.

Linden canvassed for money (which was willingly given by the community) to publish the poetry that he urged his students to write. Lewis, an art teacher at Memorial Composite High School in Sydney Mines, N.S., encouraged her students to use their work as illustrations in the book.

The result is a 180-page volume titled The Future Is In Our Hands, consisting of poems, the history of the Cape Breton Jewish community, and comments by parents on the positive effect the project has had on their children. It will be distributed to schools, libraries and all Grade 6 teachers in Cape Breton, Linden said.

Herman Nathanson, who financially supported the publication, praised Linden for his work with the children.

"He has a good heart. The children are his interest. He has such a good rapport with them that he can reach them and continue this message of hope."

Alaura Moore, like many of her 28 classmates, has more than one poem in the book. Some wrote up to five.

"I learned a lot during our classes but today, hearing Mr. Tenenbaum, I learned so much more," she said. "It truly makes a difference hearing from someone who was there rather than reading books. I think everyone today should be talking about the Holocaust and remembering, because of what's happening now [with genocides] throughout the world."

Parent Don Brien, whose son Will recited passionate words of thanks to Tenenbaum for telling the students his story, said a Holocaust memorial program that the kids presented in school "brought out the humanistic side. I learned a lot, too, from this project. I had never listened to a survivor tell his story before. It had an impact on me and the other parents, as well as the children, to hear his words."

Evy Druker, chair of Cape Breton's Holocaust Education committee, which includes Jewish and non-Jewish members, praised the event.

"We started eight years ago by bringing in Holocaust speakers for Yom Hashoah," she said. "Now we have teachers and [non-Jewish] clergy on our committee. The seminar the teachers attended [in Israel] was for them to learn to teach other teachers. The response has been unbelievable."

Lewis stressed the program's significance.

"It's important for me as an educator to teach about [the Holocaust], to carry it on. There are so many young teachers coming into the system who don't know. It's important that we, as teachers, educate them so they can teach the children. There are lessons still not learned."

Canadian author writes guide to spiritual growth

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Although it was only by chance that Alan Morinis came to the study of Mussar, he says that in retrospect almost everything he did in the first five decades of his life furnished him with the skills to devote himself to its study and teaching on a full-time basis.

The Toronto-born author, who has lived in Vancouver for 27 years, was in Toronto recently to speak at a Toronto Jewish Library event about his new book Everyday Holiness: The Jewish Spiritual Path of Mussar.

The hardcover guide to Mussar, which Morinis describes in the book as "a path of spiritual self-development," follows his 2002 book Climbing Jacob's Ladder, an account of his personal Mussar journey.

A former academic who completed his PhD in anthropology at Oxford University on a Rhodes Scholarship, Morinis reached a personal crossroads when his successful career as a filmmaker of award-winning productions crashed. Devastated, and depressed by his own role in his company's collapse, he was motivated to search for answers, much as he had as a younger man when he delved into Indian spirituality and wrote his doctoral thesis on Hindu pilgrimage.

This time, his search led him to Jewish writings. Initially he thought he might find answers in Chassidism or Kabbalah, but instead it was Mussar – a movement founded in Lithuania in the mid-1800s by Rabbi Israel Salanter – that resonated with him.

His readings led him to a rabbi in New York who became his Mussar guide, and today Morinis runs the Mussar Institute (www.mussarinstitute.org), an online learning resource, from his Vancouver home.

Morinis, 57, is one of the few non-rabbis (or non-rebbetzins) to teach Mussar. Although he was raised in a secular home, he said all the previous chapters of his life prepared him for what he is doing now: being born into a Jewish family with parents from eastern Europe, being a university student and learning how to research, and learning how to lecture as a university professor.

His Mussar students range from Orthodox rabbis to non-Jews and secular Jews, with a diversity of ages from 20-somethings to septuagenarians, he said. Sometimes, as in his case, they were motivated to pursue a spiritual quest by a catalyst, but not always, he noted. "Sometimes it's just a craving, just a search."

His own catalyst, he said, was "in a sense the worst way to come upon something that changes your life. Part of the reason I do what I do is to offer people a way of getting introduced to these guidelines for living without having a very harsh catalyst. It's not necessary to have the heart broken in order to grow spiritually."

One of the byproducts of Morinis' journey has been "considerably" increased religious observance, including the recitation of blessings before he eats and daily prayer in a traditional synagogue.

Morinis and his wife Bev Spring, a physician, are a strong couple, and with their two daughters are a strong family, he said. However, his increasing involvement in Mussar and religious practice was met with "resistance and almost fear" at the beginning. "I was changing, and almost potentially changing the relationship. And it was coming about not out of a mutual contract," he said.

His Mussar teacher, Rabbi Yechiel Yitzchok Perr of the Yeshiva of Far Rockaway, on Long Island, NY, advised him early on not to go to extremes and "not to go faster" than his wife.

Now things have evolved, said Morinis. His wife is involved in Mussar studies and is a board member of the Mussar Institute, and one daughter has taken more of an interest, he said. "I don't think religious life and spiritual life are supposed to break up relationships. The challenge is to follow your spiritual motivation, and bring it into the loving relationship…

"It's challenging, of course, but so is life."

Believing in yourself

Life Coach Corner

Judy Siblin-Librach

In coaching, the word comes up over and over again. We all do it. We put off applying for that job until we lose the magical 20 pounds. Or we don't write the thank-you note right away or make the difficult phone call. We leave memos, speeches, presentations and homework until the last minute, working breathlessly to finish what we should have started earlier. It's that 15-letter word that affects all of us and reminds me of this line: "Procrastination is like a credit card: it's a lot of fun, until you get the bill."

It is a constant refrain in coaching, and as Alice P. Cornyn-Selby puts it, "Procrastination is, hands down, our favourite form of self-sabotage."

So how do we become "unstuck" and thus have more happiness, peace and calm in our lives? First of all, recognize that you aren't alone. Often we procrastinate because we are perfectionists who become so stuck on perfecting the details that we delay moving the project along until the last minute. This is a way of not having to face the fear of imperfection.

We also procrastinate because we would rather have fun. But ironically, until we complete the task, we can't fully enjoy ourselves anyway, so we might as well do what we have to do in the first place and get it out of the way.

Another common form of procrastination is seen in the crisis junkie or adrenalin seeker, who only gets motivated at the last moment when the pressure is on. There are also the people who take on too much and never face the most important task they are responsible for because they are juggling so many balls.

In their book Time Efficiency Makeover, Dorothy Breininger and Debby Bitticks state, "Very simply, procrastinating is the deliberate act of excessive postponing. Procrastination is the avoidance of doing a task that needs to be accomplished. And this avoidance can lead to feelings of guilt, inadequacy, depression and self-doubt. Procrastination interferes with professional, academic and personal success."

So how do we control it and really get unstuck from this habit of leaving a task to the last minute?

For one thing, make sure that your desk or work area is neat and organized before you start whatever task you're working on. If necessary, clean the clutter first and you will be able to see clearly what you need to accomplish. Set aside time every day to do your correspondence – thank-you notes, bills, responding to e-mails – and just sit down every day and show up at this appointment you make with yourself. This also applies to homework. If it is done every day at the same time, it becomes a good habit that can replace the postponing habit.

Also, have a great scheduling tool, whether it's manual (the old-fashioned appointment book), or a Blackberry or Palm Pilot, and let it work for you. I also find preparing a "To do" list on a fresh piece of paper every day and putting it in your workspace can be very helpful. This can be typed or handwritten, but it is a great visual aid. Also make visual reminders of the work you want to accomplish.

Remember to acknowledge what you have accomplished and what successes you have created already, instead of dwelling on what is still left to do.

Take small baby steps and break down all of the big items into manageable pieces. It also really helps to put a date beside each goal or project or assignment and stick to it. Try to visualize yourself as a person who doesn't procrastinate. Or think of someone who is very well-organized and imagine stepping into their shoes and visualize what they would do to get the job done.

Finally, take action. Once you start, the momentum really does propel you to finish the task before you know it. And just think of the great feeling you'll have when you've completed what you set out to do!

Summit bids to bolster moderates

By DAN BARON

JTA

JERUSALEM — Israeli and Palestinian leaders again were poised to meet on the pristine Red Sea shore this week in a bid to find a way out of more than six years of bloodshed.

But there was one key difference to the by-now familiar backdrop of Monday's summit at Sharm el-Sheik: this time it was intra-Palestinian rather than Israeli-Palestinian violence giving urgency to the show of diplomacy.

Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, fresh from his break with Hamas after the Islamist group violently seized control of the Gaza Strip, was to meet Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert in hopes of kick-starting peace talks that may bolster the moderates.

Hosting the summit was Egyptian President Hosni Mubarak and Jordanian King Abdullah, both keen to see Hamas contained lest their own Islamist dissidents take note and become restive.

"The events in the Gaza Strip dealt a blow at the core of Palestinian unity," Abdullah said Sunday. "The Palestinian people have reached a critical juncture in their history."

Israel wants to shore up Abbas and the PA emergency cabinet he formed to replace the Hamas-led government, though its mandate is effectively limited to the West Bank.

"We will try, in a level-headed and cautious manner, to take advantage of the opportunities created as a result of recent events in the Gaza Strip in order to build a diplomatic process with the Palestinians," Olmert said.

Convening Sunday, Israel's cabinet decided to transfer some $350 million in withheld tax funds to the Palestinian Authority, a windfall that could help Abbas' Fatah faction maintain popularity while undermining the cash-starved Hamas.

While another $350 million remains locked up by Israeli court order, the cabinet vote cleared the way for Jerusalem to resume collecting and handing over $50 million in tax and customs due from commercial crossings on the borders of the West Bank and Gaza.

At Sharm el-Sheik, Olmert also is expected to announce that Israeli security forces will ease restrictions on Palestinian movement in the West Bank. By contrast, the Hamas-ruled Gaza is penned in by Israel and Egypt, deprived of all imports other than vital aid.

Hamas was quick to denounce Abbas, with Ismail Haniyeh saying that Abbas meeting with Olmert would amount to "bribery" following a Fatah "coup."

"This money should be reaching all of the Palestinian people," Haniyeh, who was prime minister in the government dissolved by Hamas, said in a speech.

Haniyeh called for Hamas and Fatah to enter new rapprochement talks, something Abbas ruled out last week. But Abbas may need more than defiance to produce a viable peace deal with Israel that excludes Hamas.

Egypt believes the onus is on the Olmert government. Egyptian Foreign Minister Ahmed Aboul Gheit's office quoted him telling his Israeli counterpart Tzipi Livni by phone that Jerusalem should consider "halting settlement operations, ending construction of the separation wall, stopping raids on cities and removing the checkpoints."

But Olmert indicated that he would want to see concrete action by Abbas against Palestinian terrorists – whether from Hamas or from his Fatah – before Israel makes such concessions.

Israel is willing to work with a Palestinian Authority "that is committed to the principles of the international community," Olmert said in reference to past peacemaking accords.

'Violation of international law'

"And just as I have a mother and father, the Palestinians also have mothers and fathers – and their children must be returned to them. I have great confidence in my government, that they will focus more on my issue and accept the demands of my captors."

The release of the tape on Israel's Channel 2 television followed an announcement that there would be a "positive surprise" regarding Shalit Monday, exactly a year after his abduction. The announcement was made by Abu Mujahid, a spokesman for the Popular Resistance Committees, one of three Hamas-linked groups that captured Shalit.

"Shalit is alive and in very good shape," Mujahid said. "His health is good and he's stable. We are treating him according to our religion's instructions on how to deal with war prisoners." Mujahid also said Shalit does not need anything and is receiving good treatment.

Shalit, 20, was kidnapped by Palestinian gunmen in a cross-border raid into Israel from the Gaza Strip on June 25, 2006. He has not been seen or heard from since he was captured.

The Israeli human rights organization B'Tselem declared on Monday, the one-year anniversary of the abduction of Shalit, that holding him hostage was a war crime and he must be immediately released.

The organization, which mainly works to protect the human rights of Palestinians in the West Bank and Gaza Strip, emphasized in a press statement that those involved in the kidnapping bear individual criminal liability for the war crime.

"The circumstances of his capture and the behaviour of his captors clearly indicate that he is a hostage," B'Tselem said.

International humanitarian law absolutely prohibits "the taking and holding of a person by force in order to compel the enemy to meet certain demands, while threatening to harm or kill that person if the demands are not met," the organization stated.

B'Tselem said the Hamas leadership has to work for Shalit's immediate release, and without conditions. Hamas currently controls all security apparatus in the Gaza Strip after ousting Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas' Fatah more than a week ago.

Until the soldier's release, B'Tselem said, his captors have to treat him humanely and grant Red Cross representatives access to him. The organization noted that preventing the Red Cross from visiting Shalit is a "flagrant violation of international law."

At a ceremony near the Knesset to mark Shalit's abduction Sunday, his father, Noam, called for Prime Minister Ehud Olmert to secure his son's release or step down.

Channel 2 television reported Sunday that Gilad Shalit was being held in the southern Gaza Strip in an underground room inside a booby-trapped building.

Canadian universities decry boycotts

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Britain's largest public services union, UNISON, last week adopted a motion calling for international sanctions against Israel via a boycott of the Jewish state's "economic, cultural, academic and sporting" institutions.

The motion follows the May 30 call by the University and College Union (UCU), Britain's largest teachers union, to consider an academic boycott of Israel's universities.

In an e-mail to The CJN, Karen Burke, executive director of the university outreach committee at the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy, called the UNISON and UCU motions attacks "on the core values of academic life."

Burke said the academics who stand behind these motions have "decided to teach their students narrow-mindedness and intolerance."

Canadian academics and international Jewish groups, however, have risen to Israel's defence.

Heather Munroe-Blum, president of McGill University, called the UCU motion "a gross violation of the values which form the foundation… of civil society," and she "thoroughly condemned" it in a June 19 press release on the university's website.

"If [UCU members] choose to isolate Israeli universities, you should add McGill to your boycott list. We will stand steadfast against those who seek to undermine academic freedom," she wrote.

Colleagues around the nation seconded Munroe-Blum's stance.

Claude Lajeunesse, president of Concordia University, echoed Munroe-Blum's remarks in a statement on his institution's website.

"As a university president and an academic, I say with full conviction that this boycott attacks the very nature of academia, and it must be denounced," he wrote.

Stephen J. Toope, president of the University of British Columbia (UBC), called the UCU motion a "dangerous and unsupportable attack on the core values of academic life" and an attempt to "stifle" scholarly activities.

"Those British professors who have brought forward this shameful scheme ought to reflect on the example and consequence of intolerance they are communicating to their students," Toope wrote on the UBC website.

In Toronto, Lorna Marsden, president of York University, expressed similar sentiments on the university's website last week.

Marsden called the attempt by one set of academics to "dictate to another group… which academics they are permitted to communicate with… something that needs to be consigned to the dustbin of history forthwith."

In a June 14 press release, Canadian Federation of Jewish Students president Alex Halpern called on Canadian faculties and student bodies to discredit the UCU motion.

"The resolution is… a blatant display of discrimination, bias and prejudice towards Israel and targeted groups on British campuses," Halpern said. "It undermines the positive efforts of Israeli academic institutions who work towards peace, and politicizes the international academic sphere."

'Not willing to surrender its convictions'

"Any other view would forever preclude the ability of a UN committee to adjourn decisions and debate for further consultations. Striking the table with a gavel while stating that action has been postponed does not constitute a decision on a substantive point.

"By denying Canada its right to call for a vote on this subject, this council threatens to undermine not only its own rules of procedure and those of the General Assembly, but more than 60 years of established practice of the UN, which is based on the fundamental principle of equality of all its member states," Cormier said.

Foreign Minister Peter MacKay said in a news release that "Canada is very disappointed that the council, in the important decision that affects its future work, did not fully respect the principles upon which it is founded. In our view, the council has failed to meet the test of its principles of universality, impartiality, objectivity and non-selectivity. Specifically, Canada cannot accept the inclusion of a permanent agenda item on Palestine and the occupied Arab territories, as it singles out one situation for highly politicized, partial and subjective treatment of a complex issue."

A UN news release indicated that Louise Arbour, the UN's High Commissioner for Human Rights, and a former judge of the Supreme Court of Canada, extended "her appreciation to all those who contributed to launching the council on a consensual basis. Despite the potentially divisive issues that the council had confronted, the spirit of co-operation and mutual respect would, she hoped, remain the hallmark of the Human Rights Council."

Canada's position was applauded by the Canada-Israel Committee, the Jewish community's Israel-advocacy organization. "The pro-Israel community continues to be impressed and appreciative of the consistency of Canada's principled stand on these issues," said Shimon Fogel, chief executive officer of the organization.

"Even in face of substantial pressure from others on the council, Canada was simply not willing to surrender its convictions of what ought to inform the actions and decision of the UN and its agencies."

He said Canada's position denying the council had reached a consensus – other council members said a consensus was reached even without Canada's approval – would have repercussions. "In the UN lexicon, consensus means having a certain moral authority," Fogel said. By challenging the purported consensus and calling for a vote, where it could have opposed the procedural steps, "it builds into the narrative a formal challenge to what they did."

Fogel noted that the United States, which is not a council member, and the European Union had issued statements criticizing the measures.

In Geneva, Hillel Neuer, executive director of UN Watch, said the EU countries had backed adoption of the reform package as a compromise and that the Mideast issues were not a deal-breaker for them.

However, "this is not something that is imperfect. It's evil. It's part of the demonization of Israel. [Iranian president Mahmoud] Ahmadinejad can cite it to show the world considers Israel the grossest violator of human rights. It fuels anti-Semitism. It is an evil decision."

Neuer, whose stinging March 23 critique of the council is widely viewed on YouTube, contrasted the creation of the special rapporteur on the occupied Palestinian territories to that in other regions. John Dugard, the Palestine rapporteur, has no term limit, while all others are asked to examine the situation in a region without singling out one party, while the Palestine rapporteur can only examine violations of human rights and international humanitarian law by Israel. It is outside Dugard's mandate to report on violations of the human rights of Israelis by Palestinians, Neuer said.

Neuer pointed to another example he said shows how far the council is straying from the promotion of human rights. Last week, the council announced that Libya was designated head of an anti-racism panel and will oversee two years of preparatory meetings leading up to a world conference in 2009, which is a successor to the notorious Durban conference.

"Choosing Col. [Moammar] Khadafy to head a world anti-racism conference is like appointing a pyromaniac to be fire chief," said Neuer. "It is obscene that the same racist government that awarded its highest prize in 2002 to convicted Holocaust denier Roger Garaudy is now in charge of fighting racism" and may host the conference.

Abbas denounces Hamas

Mahmoud Abbas ruled out reconciliation talks with Hamas, denouncing the Islamist group as "putschist assassins." The Palestinian Authority president said last Wednesday that he was firm in his decision to dissolve the inter-factional coalition government. "There will be no dialogue with those killers, those coup plotters," Abbas told lawmakers in Ramallah. "I turn to our people in Gaza and tell them, the designs of these putschist assassins have no future." Hamas has accused Abbas of being party to an Israeli-American "plot" to cut off Gaza from the West Bank and thus make the Palestinian Authority more malleable in peace negotiations. But Abbas denied this. "I stress my rejection of any Israeli attempt to take advantage of this act perpetrated by the coup militias to pave the way for the separation of Gaza and the West Bank," he said.

Barak defence minister

Ehud Barak's appointment as defense minister was ratified by the Knesset. The former Israeli prime minister assumed the key cabinet post last Monday following the parliament's 46-22 vote. Barak replaces Amir Peretz, whose year-long tenure was clouded by the failures of the Lebanon war. In a parting speech, Peretz said he had been "forced to pay for the foul-ups of the past" – a veiled reference to policy mistakes by previous, more experienced defence ministers. Barak, who served as prime minister and defence minister between 1999 and 2001, also ended the term of Peretz's deputy, Efraim Sneh. He did not immediately name a replacement. In one of his first acts as minister, he ordered the army to allow wounded Palestinians gathered at the Gaza Strip border to enter Israel.

Gay pride parade held in Jerusalem

About 2,000 participants turned out last Thursday for Jerusalem's annual gay pride parade. The event, which went ahead after Israel's Supreme Court rejected last-minute appeals by opponents, was held under massive police security, as some 7,000 officers were deployed following threats by fervently Orthodox Jews. Earlier in the day, a 32-year old fervently Orthodox man with an explosive device was apprehended by police in downtown Jerusalem. The man said he had planned to set off the bomb in bushes near the march to scare away participants. Protests against the annual gay pride event in Jerusalem had increased in recent days despite calls by some fervently Orthodox rabbis for community members to stay home and pray.

Sharansky named museum chairman

Natan Sharansky was appointed board chair of the Beth Hatefutsoth museum in Tel Aviv. Sharansky received the unanimous support of the museum's board of directors, according to a statement released last Monday. The museum tells the story of the Jewish Diaspora. "I am thrilled to welcome Natan as our chairman," said Hasia Israeli, the museum's director general. "He feels the importance of our two-fold mission – to build a world-class museum that tells the global Jewish story using the most engaging methods and to find new ways to create mutual identity among Jews for generations to come – wherever they live." Sharansky, a former Russian refusenik who moved to Israel in 1986, retired from the Knesset in November.

Israeli company building malls in Ukraine

An Israeli company has recently purchased a 2.6-acre lot in Kiev on which it plans to build a shopping mall. Engel Europe is reportedly going to build a portfolio of at least 10 malls in Ukraine and then float its Ukrainian business on a European exchange, perhaps the London Stock Exchange. Since the 2004 Orange Revolution, Ukraine has managed to attract significant investment from Israeli developers. Engel Europe is also negotiating to build malls in Volgograd in Russia and in the Belarusian capital of Minsk. In related news, Bank Leumi is said to be close to finalizing the purchase of Vneshtorgbank Ukraine from VTB, one of Russia's largest banks.

Rabbi and other faith leaders condemn terrorism at Bali conference

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Rabbi Daniel Landes, director and rosh yeshiva of the Pardes Institute of Jewish Studies in Jerusalem, has spent the better part of his 32-year career serving the Jewish people and working in a Jewish environment, although he has interacted with counterparts of other faiths on an academic level.

But now that he has returned from a groundbreaking multi-faith conference in Indonesia where he was the first rabbi to speak publicly in the world's largest Muslim country, he feels it was a mistake not to have become involved in this kind of dialogue before.

"I went from almost zero to 100," he said in a phone interview from his office at Pardes, which is open to students of all Jewish backgrounds. "I'm an Orthodox rabbi. My life has totally been very much within my people."

Rabbi Landes joined Indonesia's former president, Abdurrahman Wahid, and Hindu spiritual leader Sri Sri Ravi Shankar (not the sitarist of the same name) as one of three main speakers sharing a platform at a June 12 Bali conference called "Tolerance Between Religions: A Blessing For All Creation." Protestant, Catholic and Buddhist leaders responded to their presentation before an audience consisting mainly of 100 community activists, young imams, and Muslim and Hindu students.

"You cannot underestimate the symbolic importance of [my] sitting there with two great leaders," said the rabbi, who called the conference "uplifting.

"Those who are strong in their own faith commitments – those who represent the tradition – need to be in this type of conversation."

The trio of leaders was the first to sign a "call to action" condemning the link between religion and violence, according to a press release from the Simon Wiesenthal Center. Conference goals also included reducing the growing polarization between faiths since the Sept. 11, 2001 attacks in the United States, according to a press release from Pardes.

The conference was co-sponsored by the Wahid Institute, the Simon Wiesenthal Center's Museum of Tolerance, and LibForAll Foundation. Rabbi Abraham Cooper, the centre's associate dean, was moderator for the day-long event.

Rabbi Landes – a 57-year-old native of Chicago who lived in Los Angeles before moving to Israel 12 years ago – said the big fear about dialogue, not just within Orthodox Judaism, but in traditional circles in other religions, is that "you'll lose part of what you yourself believe.

"Of course what really happens – there is a transformation, but you become the better part of your own religion. You become more of who you are in a better way. That's the notion of true dialogue. On a personal level, this was a very extraordinary benefit."

Rabbi Landes – who said he was initially "the 'B' rabbi" on the program – became a main speaker after Rabbi Israel Meir Lau, former Ashkenazi chief rabbi of Israel, was denied a visa for the gathering because of his Israeli diplomatic passport. Indonesia does not recognize the State of Israel.

Rabbi Landes, a former professor of ethics and values at Yeshiva University of Los Angeles and a former director of educational projects at the Wiesenthal centre, travelled on his American passport and wore his kippah wherever he went.

However, he said he spoke on condition that he be introduced as a rabbi from Jerusalem. "The word Israel didn't come up as much as Jerusalem, but that's okay," he said. "You do this step by step."

Rabbi Landes said that people he told about the conference in advance were concerned for his safety. He himself was "concerned, but I wasn't really fearful.

"I think I rose to the level of my compatriots," said the rabbi, referring in particular to Wahid, who has "stood for human rights on an amazing level."

At the opening plenary, Wahid – who co-authored a June 12 Wall Street Journal article with Rabbi Lau titled The Evils of Holocaust Denial – condemned Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad for Holocaust denial. "He is wrong, and I say so publicly," said Wahid.

Sol Teichman, a Holocaust survivor who spoke at the event, "represented not only destruction but renewal of Jewish life," Rabbi Landes said. "In Balinese culture renewal of life is a very important cultural trope.

The Balinese people, he noted, are "tremendously traumatized" by bombings in 2005. "They no longer understand that [bombings are abhorrent] in an abstract way. They understand that in reality."

Survivors of bombings in Indonesia and Israel spoke in a session that was televised in the Middle East and Europe on the Arabic language Al Hurra satellite network, according to the Wiesenthal Center.

"Authentic purveyors of religion want to preserve life," not destroy it, said Rabbi Landes. The appeal of extremists lies in their knowledge of religion, but they're "really going against a fundamental in each religion – that life is sacred, and that God is the God of life. Terrorism is very heretical."

Rabbi Landes was surprised to see how many people knew who he was and why he was in Bali. "Everyone from the airline crew to government officials to shopkeepers" greeted him in their "very graceful way" and told him he was the first "Jewish priest" to speak publicly in Indonesia.

"There was a tremendous validation of my being there with the people," he said. Although he faced questions about Palestine and Israel that were "sometimes pretty pointed," he said he felt they were rooted more in "inquiry" than anything else.

What surprised him, he said, was "how much hope people took in [the conference]." Part of his message, he said, was "the notion of hope."

"Tolerance in many parts of the world needs a religious basis," he explained. Having that basis "strikes a very deep chord with people."

He anticipates follow-up to the conference. A professor of Jewish law, Rabbi Landes said he met professors of Islam who expressed interest in coming to Jerusalem.

"A dialogue between Muslims and Hindus on the area of religious law could be very productive not just theoretically but practically," he added.

Two years later, Gaza evacuees still need housing and jobs

By NADAV SHRAGAI
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Almost two years after Israel's pullout from Gaza, construction of permanent housing has started at only two of the 26 sites intended for 9,000 evacuees, according to a report by the Gush Katif Settlements Committee.

For example, no groundwork has been laid at Nitzanim and Talmei Yafe, projects decided upon months before the pullout began.

The committee predicts that the trailer parks now housing the evacuees will remain in use for at least five years, instead of the two years that the government intended.

The resulting problems are legion:

- Some 1,450 former residents of Gush Katif are still unemployed.
- More than 500 families are in bad financial shape, and some even receive food packages and help from welfare agencies.
- Because of the rampant unemployment, many families are using their state compensation funds for daily subsistence instead of saving it for building a house.
- Only 33 farmers out of 400 have been given alternate lands, and of these, only a handful are back in real business. Those who have resumed growing crops face major infrastructure hurdles such as erratic electricity, sewage and drainage.
- Farmers lost their overseas markets, buyers and distributors.
- A memorandum of understanding with the government on amendments to the Evacuation Compensation Law improved matters on a personal level. However, business owners and farmers will not be compensated for lost income until they can rebuild their businesses. Furthermore, compensation for Gush Katif evacuees is low and does not reflect the true value of their property, the report said. For instance, compensation for greenhouses is 60 per cent of the cost of erecting them. Compensation for seniority is 10 per cent of that granted to people evacuated from Yamit under the peace treaty with Egypt. And 650 people who requested individual property appraisals have received either no decision or a very low assessment, because the state froze individual appraisals after it turned out that many were higher than the compensation afforded by the law.

Despite all the above, the committee noted that more than 85 per cent of evacuees continue to live in a community framework, in order to uphold their ideals and provide a support network for each other.

MK Uri Ariel, who chairs both the National Union-National Religious Party faction and the Knesset lobby for the evacuees, said the report underscores the state's colossal failures.

"Housing at temporary sites is continuing long beyond the period intended, and no government ministry has a working plan for the extended stay," he said.

Centre gives Jerusalem neighbourhood new hope

By WENDY ELLIMAN
IPS

JERUSALEM — The two oldest children of Yulia, a divorced mother of four who made aliyah from Russia six years ago, were poor students who found math and English especially unfathomable. One scraped through his matriculation, his grades too poor to get him much further. The other failed to matriculate at all.

Yulia is determined that her two younger children, now in grades 4 and 6, will do better. In the fall, they will attend a new centre, the Israel Asper Community Action Center, that will provide resources to help children improve their educational achievements.

"They know all about the computer as a toy, judging by the time they spend playing computer games," Yulia says. "But soon they'll have a chance to use the computer to improve their math and English through specially designed programs."

The centre, which was dedicated in early June, is the fourth in a lengthening chain of Community Action centres built as an initiative of Canada's 24-year-old Asper Foundation, in partnership with Jewish National Fund (JNF) of Canada.

"In the past four years, we've initiated centres in Ofakim, Migdal HaEmek and Be'er Sheva, but it was important to us to be in our beloved Jerusalem as well," says the foundation's managing director, Gail Sheryl Asper, a Winnipeg-born lawyer who directs CanWest Global Communications Corporation and the CanWest Global Foundation.

"As Israel is the soul of the Jewish people, so Jerusalem is the soul of Israel. And once we began planning in Jerusalem, we found a wonderful partner [for this centre] in the Jerusalem Foundation," Asper says.

The centre is in the city's Ramot Alon neighbourhood, which is home to veteran Israelis and immigrants, mainly from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia. Established in 1974 and today home to 47,000 people, Ramot's social and economic future now hangs in the balance.

"This was once a pluralistic community of secular, religious and [haredi] veterans and newcomers," says Ramot Alon Community Center chair Ze'evik Landner, who has lived in the neighbourhood for the past 24 years. "Although there is still one section consisting of beautifully landscaped homes and apartment buildings owned by affluent and upper-middle class residents, many of them have moved out. Now there are mostly large pockets of… areas facing poverty and social problems. We must invest in our community to stop its slide into a downward spiral."

The investment shared by the Asper Foundation, the Jerusalem Foundation and Canadian JNF is close to $350,000, a portion of which will go to renovating premises provided for the centre by the Jerusalem municipality. The lion's share, however, will go to finance educational enrichment programs and activities largely geared toward disadvantaged youngsters. It will also serve as a multicultural meeting place for residents from vastly different backgrounds, and enable the new immigrant population to integrate into the general population of the neighbourhood.

One of the centre's four sections will be for youngsters like Yulia's. Its tutors will help with homework and oversee computer courses that reinforce English and math based on the school syllabus. A second section for younger children will have supervised games and toys, computer games for infants and a puppet theatre. Teens will be given "green" tools in the centre's third section, where a unique program run in tandem with the JNF will operate. Through field trips and day and summer camps, the youngsters will learn leadership skills, Zionism, Israeli history and how to maintain a green environment

The fourth section will be a computer lab with 20 computer stations, which will teach kindergartners the three Rs in preparation for first grade and include educational games. The computer lab will also be used to train teens to become computer instructors, all the way to website-building; and it will provide unemployed residents with computer training and young couples with a family budget planning course.

"As we've seen at our three community action centres already up and running, these are places that can provide educational support beyond the reach of the school system," Asper says. "While they particularly help youngsters with educational difficulties or children from deprived families, their combination of technology-oriented education and teaching of leadership skills and heritage can help all comers achieve their optimal educational level."

"I believe that the Israel Asper Community Action Center will become the breathing heart and center of community life in Ramot Alon," Landner says. "Perhaps it will hold the key to a brighter and better future for Ramot's deprived youngsters. At the very least, it will bring children and families from vastly different backgrounds and beliefs together under one roof."

Aspects of DeLillo's 9/11 novel are startlingly effective

- Falling Man by Don DeLillo, Scribner.

By NORMAN RAVVIN
Special to The CJN

A novelist who chooses recent history as his subject faces unusual challenges. In Philip Roth's view, life in his country – what he has called the "American berserk" – outdoes anything that might be conjured by the creative imagination.

Norman Ravvin

In Roth's recent novella, Everyman, Sept. 11 is given only glancing mention, as the reason why certain New Yorkers decide to abandon Manhattan. The most notable efforts to portray the repercussions of Sept. 11 in fiction have been those by Jay McInerney, Jonathan Safran Foer and Martin Amis. All of these, it could be argued, have fallen short of the demands raised by the events themselves.

Don DeLillo may be the American novelist best suited to fictionalize events that appeared out of what he calls "a clear sky that carried human terror in those streaking aircraft, first one, then the other, the force of men's intent."

DeLillo's novels include Libra (1988), a dark and detailed portrait of Lee Harvey Oswald and the events leading up to the Kennedy assassination. His 1997 novel Underworld opens with a bravura set piece picturing Jackie Gleason, Frank Sinatra and restaurateur Toots Shor in the stands at the Polo Grounds to watch the New York Giants. DeLillo is an ironist – his fiction is often bitterly funny, satirizing the impact of politics, the media and mass market culture. The recently released Falling Man is DeLillo's take on the "American berserk" in the weeks immediately after Sept. 11.

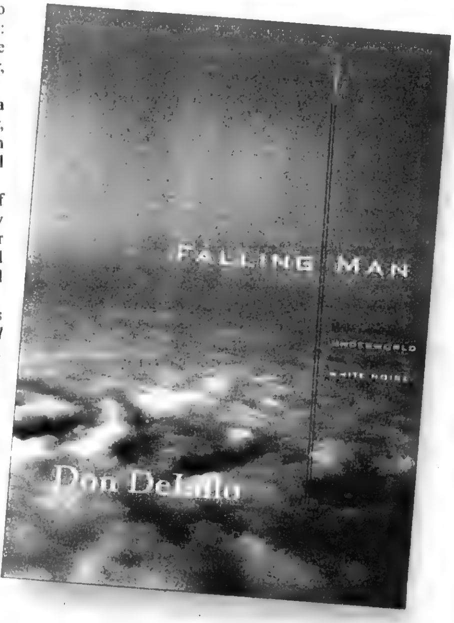
Aspects of the book are startlingly effective. In the early chapters, which have appeared as excerpts in The New Yorker, DeLillo captures the look of survivors immediately after the towers fell: "When he appeared at the door it was not possible, a man come out of an ash storm, all blood and slag, reeking of burnt matter, with pinpoint glints of slivered glass in his face."

Falling Man recalls Lower Manhattan's transformation into a strange sepulchral place: "The dead were everywhere, in the air, in the rubble, on rooftops nearby, in the breezes that carried from the river. They were settled in ash and drizzled on windows all along the streets, in his hair and on his clothes."

There is, as well, effective attention paid to the behaviour of the survivors, who find their lives poisoned by the fact that they didn't die alongside their colleagues. One character explains her predicament this way: "I know I can't sit here alive and safe and talk about our falling down some stairs when all that terror, all those dead."

Falling Man follows four characters' lives in the first weeks after Sept. 11. As in Jonathan Safran Foer's Extremely Loud and Incredibly Close, one of the four is a child, but DeLillo manages this without the mawkish sentimentality employed by Safran Foer.

DeLillo struggles to come to terms with the character and motivations of the terrorists. The novel does this most directly in a short section set in Hamburg, where the would-be terrorists hide out and ready themselves. Here we are introduced to Hammad, whose memories include fighting in Saddam's army during the Iran-Iraq War, and who seems at once ambivalent and determined to submit himself to his compatriots' strange forms of self-discipline and indoctrination. The cell's leader, who lectures and reins in any form of backsliding, is known as Amir, a "small, thin wiry man who spoke to Hammad in his face. He was very genius, others said… His full name was Mohamed Mohamed el-Amir el-Sayed Atta."



In these sections, DeLillo strives to fill a gap in the response to Sept. 11. In accounts both fictional and factual, the character and motivations of the terrorists has remained shadowy. Some effort was made in the immediate aftermath of the events to trace the family history of the men who flew the planes into the World Trade Center. The New York Times ran photographs and interviews with Atta's family. But in ways reminiscent of other literatures of atrocity, the perpetrators have proven difficult to depict and understand. DeLillo confronts this dilemma in scenes that portray a writing group made up of men and women suffering from the early stages of Alzheimer's. "They wrote about the planes," he tells us. "No one wrote a word about the terrorists. And in the exchanges that followed the readings, no one spoke about the terrorists."

DeLillo offers no grand theories, no overt interpretations of fundamentalist ideologies or the impact of nihilistic terror on modern history (there is much to be learned about the latter in the anti-czarist terror of the late 19th century, and its evocation in the novels of Dostoyevsky).

Instead, Delillo offers a curious analogy. Much of Falling Man focuses on the obsessive behaviour of a foursome of Wall Street workers who gathered routinely to play poker before the collapse of the towers. Here DeLillo explores the closed, ritualized behaviour of a group of like-minded males. In much the same way the terrorists are described as "strong-willed, determined to become one mind. Shed everything but the men you are with. Become each other's blood."

This analogy has a certain superficial impact. But it ultimately allows DeLillo to take his narrative to Las Vegas, where two survivors of the towers' collapse immerse themselves in gambling as a form of escape and self-abnegation. Other novelists have handled Vegas with greater verve, and here Falling Man becomes something less than we expect it to be. It takes on qualities much like those of DeLillo's earlier novels, and the narrative does not live up to the particular demands of the extreme events it means to explain.

By the time the novel's final pages arrive at a portrayal of the interior of the towers after being struck by planes, Falling Man has lost a good deal of the wind it needs to present these events in a startling new way. One gets the disheartening feeling, as DeLillo describes flying bodies and collapsing walls, that he has seen all this at the movies and has lost sight of the particular catastrophe he means to convey.

MEMORABLE CONCERT CAPS HOLY BLOSSOM'S 150TH ANNIVERSARY CELEBRATIONS

The excitement emanating from the Roy Thomson Hall stage was palpable last week as conductor Peter Oundjian led the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and esteemed guest clarinettist Giora Feidman through a delectable musical program to end a season of celebrations of the 150th anniversary of Holy Blossom congregation.

Jeffrey Beecher on double bass and Joaquin Valdepenas on clarinet lent further kinetic energy to proceedings as the TSO presented Rossini's Barber of Seville Overture and Opus 47 from Kol Nidre by 19th-century German-Protestant composer Max Bruch.

Cantor Benjamin Z. Maissner sang and helped lead a Shehechiyanu prayer, demonstrating (as Feidman did at several times), how easily the audience could be coaxed into joining in. A tremendous sense of goodwill seemed to fill the acoustically pure hall.

The second half of the concert consisted of Ora Bath Chaim's Love for Life, Astor Piazzolla's Two Tangos and George Gershwin's Porgy and Bess Suite. The orchestra achieved superb clarity, allowing Feidman's jazzy notes to soar. All that was missing was the schmaltz.

As anniversary chair Henrietta Chesnie noted in the program, this was not the first time the TSO has figured in a Holy Blossom celebration. Fifty years ago, on the congregation's 100th anniversary, the occasion was marked with a TSO concert under the direction of Walter Susskind and featuring guest pianist Glenn Gould.

Fringe Festival Offerings: This year's Fringe Theatre Festival (www.fringetoronto.com, 416-966-1062) runs July 4 to 15, with many exciting productions, including these with specifically Jewish content or participants.

- Total Score presents Don't Look, an "incest drama" written and performed by Daniel Sadavoy and Rebecca Applebaum; directed and co-created by Maya Rabinovitch. This "multilayered piece full of delightful tension and unnerving hilarity" focuses on two first cousins who try to escape from a humiliation shared in their youth. Royal St. George Theatre, 120 Howland Ave.
- Two in the Bush, the sequel to last year's The Burning Bush!, marks the return of "the stripping rabbi" from her world tour, saving souls one lap dance at a time. Presented by Toronto native Tracey Erin Smith. Royal St. George. www.theburningbush.ca
- In Windows, Walls and Doors, by Yael Sirlin, two actors create four diverse roles in this touching and humorous drama. Having moved from Israel, a limo entrepreneur and his wife build a new life, while a cupcake franchise hopeful and her husband struggle with their marriage. A drive to the airport unites them. St. Vladimir's Theatre, 620 Spadina Ave. www.kissandtellinc.com
- Shiksas Sit Shiva, by Catherine Hayos and Melinda Little, is a comedy about loss, love and interfaith marriage. Royal St. George
- Like, Omigawd! is a "sugar-pop '80s rock musical" that focuses on a small-town girl with big dreams who moves to the big city for her final year of high school. Walmer Theatre Centre, 188 Lowther Ave. www.likeomigod.ca
- Actor Avi Phillips and his father and two sisters have created an original play, Eleanor, an imaginary account of what might have preceded the events in the Beatles' song Eleanor Rigby. Robert Gill Theatre, 214 College St.
- Talk Thirty To Me, a documentary play by Oonagh Duncan with David Schokking, reflects an age and era of uncertainty and demonstrates that the truth is stranger and funnier than fiction. Tarragon Extra Space, 30 Bridgman Ave.
- Ex-Zhyle, directed by Sasha Kovacs and with Jonathan Heppner and Marni Van Dyk, is derived from the writings of Pauline Johnson and José Martí, and focuses on two clowns on a sacred quest. Tarragon Theatre Extra Space
- Di-To Co-Operative presents Spilling Beans, by Dina Ajlenberg and Thomas Junek, with a cast of five. The play dives into the minds and consciences of four not so random people in a café – an unhappily married couple, an exiled princess and a recent widow. Tarragon Theatre Main Space. www.ditocoop.com
- Corporate Valentines, by Andrew Borkowski and featuring Jennifer Lieberman, Candi Zell, Matt Mccarthy and John Palmieri. Over-educated corporate types misbehave in the men's washroom in this satire of "our morally decadent business culture." Tarragon Theatre Main Space
- The Gladstone Variations consists of four plays involving Toronto's 118-year-old Gladstone Hotel. With Aviva Armour-Ostroff, Stewart Arnott, Marc Bendavid, Brett Christopher, Richard Greenblatt, Marcia Johnson, Lori Nancy Kalamanski, Athena Lamarre, Dov Mickelson, Bob Naismith, Christopher Stanton and David Yee. Gladstone Hotel, 1214 Queen St. W.
- Three Fringe shows are being performed at the Miles Nadal JCC (416-924-6211, ext. 606). Conservatives in Love, by Dave Carley and directed by Sue Minor, is a study of city urbanites who move into downtown condos; with Jason Jazwary, Richard Lee, Anne Page and Naomi Snieckus. Napoleon's Secret Diary presents the emperor as a bumbling fool, a combination of Inspector Clouseau and Bob Newhart. www.monstertheatre.com Scratch features a comic duo who improvise dozens of characters and story lines. www.myspace.com/ scratch_improv
- Rumpleforskin, A Revised and Circumcised Virgin of an Old Fairy's Tail, is veteran writer/actor Don Harron's Fringe debut. Queen Dragonella worries about her son Etheldred's ability to rule the land of Tatterdemalia. Gold would help. It also stars Yiddish star Gloria Valentine. At the Tarragon Theatre Extra Space.
- The 'Welcome to the Show' Show is a 60-minute bombardment of clever sketch comedy by Picnicface, described as "the best comedy troupe currently working in Canada." At the Helen Gardiner Phelan Playhouse, 79A St. George St.
- George Bernard Shaw's comedy Mrs. Warren's Profession is resurrected at the historic Hart House Music Room, 7 Hart House Circ., second floor. This once-banned play is directed by Laurel Smith. www.burningpassionstheatre.com.

Israeli dance pioneer honoured at upcoming festival

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Anyone with a connection to folk dance in Toronto is almost certain to know Teme Kernerman, and more than likely to have worked with her.

The pioneer dancer, teacher and choreographer's career in Israeli, international and modern dance has included work across North America, in Israel and even in China. In her 60 years of dance, Kernerman has choreographed a presentation [illegible] the Queen and founded dance groups for people of all ages in Toronto.

She was recently recognized in a new CD-ROM, Jewish Women: A Comprehensive Historical Encyclopedia, under the section Israeli Folk Dance Pioneers in North America.

This weekend, Kernerman will be honoured by the Israeli dance community, at the second annual Toronto IsReal Dance Festival.

"I did all this because there was something in me – I had to do this," she said in an interview. "I never considered myself as a pioneer, I just did these things."

Born and raised in Toronto, Kernerman's first taste of Israeli dance was as a 15-year-old at the Habonim Labor Zionist Movement's Camp Kvutza.

Hired as an arts and crafts instructor, she was a disaster, she said, but she quickly found her niche with Israeli dance each Friday night.

Her husband, Barry, who was then a counsellor too, took over arts and crafts and Teme led dance.

"She was an amazing teacher. I can still hear her voice in my head as she taught," said Naomi Fromm, one of Kernerman's former campers.

Kernerman's early dance days included a trip to Israel with the Habonim movement, where she organized folk dancing and concerts at Kibbutz Geva, and studies in Toronto with Ernie and Ivy Krehm at the University Settlement Recreation Centre. She studied folk dance and modern interpretive dance at the YM-YWHA on Bloor Street (now the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre).

After a brief stint as a nursery school teacher, she moved to New York to pursue dance studies full time.

There, Kernerman studied modern dance under some of its early leaders, including José Limón, Murray Louis and Alwin Nikolais. She also received two scholarships for summer courses at the Connecticut College School of Dance.

She honed her Israeli dance skills with the late Fred Berk, an Israeli folk dance pioneer in New York and North America.

"I taught for him, I demonstrated for him. He was an inspiration to me," Kernerman said. "He really assisted me and gave me a lot of knowledge and a lot of experience."

In New York, Kernerman also helped run folk dance competitions for children in Hebrew schools, setting the stage for Rikudiyah, the annual children's dance festival she founded in Toronto, now in its 28th year.

"Thousands of children have been exposed to Israeli folk dance through Rikudiyah, and it's because of that program that there is Israeli dance in the schools," Kernerman said.

She moved back to Toronto in 1957 and became the first full-time dance director at the YM-YWHA. She then founded Nirkoda, Toronto's first performing Israeli dance group, which she led for 25 years. The group still performs today, under the guidance of a former Nirkoda dancer, Ronit Eisenman.

Teme and Barry married in Toronto and made aliyah in 1960. They lived in Israel for eight years and had a son and daughter.

Upon returning to Canada, Kernerman headed the folk dance department of the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre, where she has worked in various capacities and is still folk dance co-ordinator.

Her achievements stretch beyond the wooden floors and mirrored walls she helped design. In addition to Rikudiyah, Kernerman started a similar festival, Machol Hanoar, for teenagers, and a group called the Chai Dancers, for people 55 and over.

Kernerman founded both the Ontario Folk Dance Association and the Ontario Folk Dance Teachers Association. She created and runs a teacher training dance program, and has served as consultant and choreographer for TV shows and movies.

Kernerman is currently president and examiner for the folk dance division of the Performing Arts Educators of Canada.

Teme Kernerman, Toronto's Israeli folk dance pioneer.

She is a member of Darchei Noam Congregation, Toronto's Reconstructionist synagogue, and created the Israeli Dance Chevra there with Simon Shapiro.

She recalled a favourite anecdote about being asked to teach a master performance class in China without her music. It seems the multi-talented woman simply can't sing. She had tears in her eyes when she recalled teaching the Chinese class with only her voice as background music. They picked up the moves and were a joy to teach, she said. But as she and Barry drove away, the students waved to them and sang Mayim, the song she had taught.

"Teme!" her husband groaned "They're all off-key!"

While she doesn't have perfect pitch, her heart and feet have been in the right place for decades.

"Anything that has to do with Israeli dance in Toronto, basically, she started it," Fromm said. "She would go in anywhere that she saw a void and she would create a department."

"It's the kind of thing that you can come and lose yourself – whatever your problems are, they don't exist when you're dancing," Kernerman said of her craft. "I want to keep dancing for as long as I can."

Kernerman will be honoured Friday night at the IsReal Dance Festival, which runs June 29 to July 1 at the Miles Nadal Jewish Community Centre. The festival features out-of-town choreographers and teachers who introduce new dances.

Prolific composer dies at 90

One of Canada's best known and most prolific composers, whose work has been performed by such artists as Glenn Gould, Maureen Forrester, Ben Heppner, Anton Kuerti and Zubin Mehta, died of complications from Parkinson's syndrome in Toronto on June 13. He was 90.

Oskar Morawetz was born in Czechoslovakia in 1917, the second son of a secular Jewish couple.

After the Munich Agreement was signed in 1938, givnig the Sudetenland to Germany, Morawetz was sent by his father to Paris to study music. In March 1940, he evaded the invading Nazis by fleeing to the Dominican Republic. He immigrated to Canada in June 1940, where he joined his parents and two of his siblings who had immigrated to Canada in 1939.

Morawetz wrote more than 100 orchestral and chamber works, including From the Diary of Anne Frank, Carnival Overture, Piano Concerto No.1 and Memorial to Martin Luther King.

Morawetz was a member of both the Order of Ontario and the Order of Canada, and he won two Juno awards, three senior fellowships from the Canada Council and a Golden Jubilee Medal.

He is survived by two children, two grandchildren and an extended family. He divorced his wife Ruth Shipman in 1984.

Local's low-budget rock opera plays the Fringe

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Evan Malach

Onstage, Evan Malach looks, acts and sings like a young Bruce Springsteen, back when "The Boss" was still a hungry, lean and passionate troubadour, looking to be the world's next rock 'n' roll star.

Offstage, the driven 22-year-old Toronto playwright and musician is pretty much the same, only with less singing.

And starting July 4, after a successful run in Montreal, Malach will bring his latest play, In Adequacy, back home for audiences to experience at Toronto's Fringe theatre festival.

Malach conceived the idea for this new play after his first production, Being John Cusack, was a big hit on the alternative stage during his student days in Montreal in 2005.

"I felt like it had gone very well, and I was into the idea of writing another play," he said. "But I couldn't come up with that unique idea of something that would continue the momentum I had from [Being John Cusack]. I was feeling very inadequate… feeling like I was just a one-hit wonder."

Enter In Adequacy, a low-budget rock opera in the comedic mould of We Will Rock You and Spamalot, about a forlorn musician who aspires to rock greatness, into which Malach cast himself as the protagonist, Donny.

In his quest to find musical glory, Donny sets off to Los Angeles, same as anyone who wants to make it in showbiz. Along the way, he gets stuck in the Mojave Desert, in a town called Adequacy, only to discover hard truths about himself and his dream.

While there, he ends up befriending some of Adequacy's quirky residents including Hugh Bris, the town's haughty circumcisionist; Danté, the town's diabolical innkeeper; Path Girl, the local nightclub chanteuse and Fallacy O'Neill, a meteorologist who suffers from seasonal affective disorder.

Malach penned 11 original pop-rock songs for In Adequacy, and the general tone of the play is a loving, tongue-in-cheek poke at what his press release terms the "cheesiness" of musical theatre.

The cast is backed by an eight-piece band using guitars, drums, bass, saxophone, piano and harmonica to power Malach's humorous and thoughtful narrative along.

Still, Malach uses the genre to great effect, eliciting laughs and inspiring audience members to remember and sing along to his catchy songs well after the curtain goes down.

And that's just the response Malach hoped for.

"It's absolutely exhilarating," he said. "Having your words and music come alive in the voices and instruments of others… working with such talented musicians and actors, it's an amazing experience. Every time I do it, I have so much fun."

Malach recently moved back to Toronto, having just graduated "with great distinction" from McGill University, where he majored in humanistic studies with a focus on music and a history minor.

He's since founded his own company, Infinite Potential Entertainment, with an eye toward achieving his manifold career goals.

"I started it with the mindset that I didn't want to limit myself to any one [entertainment] industry path," Malach said. "I want to keep my options open for different fields… ranging from theatre to film and writing and performing. This is the perfect opportunity to amalgamate so many of my different passions."

With his knack for songwriting and ability to delight audiences, Malach is ensuring he remains far from inadequate.

Michael Winterbottom, right, directs Angelina Jolie in A Mighty Heart.

British director describes the making of A Mighty Heart

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Michael Winterbottom, the British director of A Mighty Heart, was coincidentally in Pakistan when Daniel Pearl, the Jewish American journalist, was murdered by Islamic radicals in 2002.

He was filming In This World, which depicts the flight of two Afghan refugees trying to make their way to Europe, when he heard the sombre announcement of his death.

"It was incredibly shocking news, though I did not have any special knowledge of the case," he said in an interview to promote A Mighty Heart, which opened last week.

Adapted from the memoir of Mariane Pearl, the late journalist's wife, the movie charts Pearl's final days in Karachi in tense semi-documentary style.

Winterbottom was drawn into the project when Dede Gardner, the co-producer, asked him to read Pearl's book, A Mighty Heart: The Brave Life and Death of My Husband Danny Pearl.

"I thought it was a very powerful story," said Winterbottom, 46, a prolific director whose credits include Welcome to Sarajevo, The Road to Guantanamo and 24 Hour Party People and whose films have been nominated for three Palme d'Or prizes at the Cannes Film Festival. "It was incredibly impressive."

He was further initiated into the film when one of the co-producers, the actor Brad Pitt, called Winterbottom. Pitt had seen The Road to Guantanamo – a docudrama about three young British Muslim men who were captured by American forces in Afghanistan, accused of being enemy combatants and held without charges in a U.S. prison in Cuba – and liked it immensely.

"We talked about Mariane's book and his ideas about how the film should be made," said Winterbottom.

This was followed by a meeting between Winterbottom and Mariane Pearl – a journalist herself – in Paris.

It went well and led to a meeting with Pitt and his wife, the actress Angelina Jolie, who was slated to portray Mariane.

"Angie and Mariane were already friends," said Winterbottom. "They were very close and very similar, straightforward and easy to deal with."

A Mighty Heart was shot on location in Pakistan, India and France in the summer and autumn of 2006.

"I don't think it would have been possible to make without filming it in Pakistan," he explained. "The whole point would have been lost."

The production company secured the co-operation of the ministries of interior and culture, of Sind province and of the Karachi police.

Filming took place in Karachi, Islamabad and Rawalpindi.

To Winterbottom's consternation, the intelligence services – which are alleged to have ties with Islamic extremists – were not as forthcoming.

"People followed us and gave us grief," said Winterbottom. And, he added, some crew members were arrested and then released. "I don't know why they had this attitude."

Another problem was that Pakistani actors due to shoot scenes in India had trouble obtaining Indian visas.

Nevertheless, Winterbottom and his crew muddled through.

Although he is quite familiar with Pakistan, he does not pretend to know it. "The more time you spend there, the less you understand it. It's a complex, contradictory country on the fault line of various ideas."

Asked whether Islamic radicalism is of concern to him, Winterbottom dodged the question and focused instead on Mariane Pearl.

"Mariane is saying that you have to reject extremism and not respond to terror with terror, and not to give in to prejudices on either side."

Winterbottom is currently in the process of finishing Genova, a film he set aside when he committed to A Mighty Heart.

Starring Colin Firth, Catherine Keener and Hope Davis, it is described as "a ghost story" about a British man who moves his two American daughters to Italy after his wife's death.

"I'm glad to be doing something so different," he said.

Genova will be his 15th film, not counting BBC television movies such as Jude the Obscure and Family.

As far as he is concerned, there is no mystery to his prolificacy. "I keep them simple and cheap."

Cohen is first Jew since 1978 to win NCAA singles tennis

By MARVIN GLASSMAN
Special to The CJN

MIAMI — When tennis player Audra Cohen won the NCAA singles tennis championship for the University of Miami this year, she became the first Jewish player to win the title since Stacy Margolin of University of Southern California in 1978, as well as the first University of Miami player ever to do so.

The 21-year-old Plantation, Fla., resident has now taken the bold step of turning pro, forgoing her senior year in college.

"I have achieved all that I wanted in intercollegiate tennis and am delighted to have made history for my school, and Jewish history as well. But now it's time for me to move on and see what I can achieve on the professional tennis circuit," Cohen said.

The odds are good that Cohen's NCAA title will lead her to a long career in professional tennis. In the past decade, former NCAA singles champions Jill Craybas and Lisa Raymond went on to top-30 pro rankings, played Fed Cup for the United States and enjoyed careers of more than 10 years on the women's pro tennis circuit.

"Audra's best tennis lies ahead of her. She has tremendous belief in herself and she has the physical game to go with her mental toughness," said Cohen's coach, Paige Yaroshuk-Tewes. "She has a huge serve, great ground strokes and volleys. I wish her well, because she gave her all to her school and team mates."

Unlike other great tennis players who had stories of starting the sport at age two or three, Cohen's feat is even more remarkable because she didn't take up the sport until she and her family moved to Florida when she was 11.

Born in California, Cohen was an avid swimmer, excelling in the butterfly and breast stroke. But as soon as she came to Florida, she began to pursue tennis.

"I was literally bored with swimming and wanted the change, " she said.

She didn't excel at tennis right away, but by age 14, she had made up for lost time and was rarely losing matches. As a student at St. Thomas Aquinas High School, she went undefeated in her junior and senior years, and she was named all-state four times.

Audra Cohen has the talent to turn pro.
[University of Miami photos]

Cohen became even better as the competition improved in college. In her freshman year at Northwestern University, she advanced to the NCAA finals, compiling a 51-7 record in 2004. Since transferring to the University of Miami in 2005, she's won 70 of 80 matches in two years and was ranked Number 1 in college tennis in 2007.

"Being a late bloomer had its benefits. I went to college, became more mature and made up for not having focus when I was younger," she said.

Unlike some parents who push their athletic children, Cohen's mother and father never pressured her.

"I am thrilled for Audra's success and am proud that we let her choose tennis, rather than us pushing her in the sport," said Cohen's mother, Mary Ann, a fine art publisher and dealer in Dania, Fla.

While Audra is the first athlete in her family, she might have been the next Steven Spielberg or Picasso-in-waiting, judging by what other family members love to do.

Cohen's father, Richard, was in the film business doing special effects for films such as Star Trek before joining Audra's mother in the family's fine art business, while her sister is a filmmaker in Los Angeles.

Although Cohen's mother is Catholic and her father is Jewish, Cohen identifies herself as Jewish.

"I am Jewish, not Catholic. I celebrate all Jewish holidays and hope to visit Israel one day. My parents are liberal and allowed me to choose what I want to be. I went to a Catholic high school because Florida law said I had to go there, but I survived," she said with a laugh.

Despite Cohen's impressive record in 2007, wining the NCAA singles title was no cakewalk.

In the final match, she trailed Lindsey Nelson of the University of Southern California 5-3 before rallying to win the next eight games to take a 5-0 lead in the second set en route to her 7-5, 6-2 victory.

"Audra has the right disposition, and is such an easygoing person and smart that she will find a way to win on the pro circuit. Lisa Raymond and Jill Craybas became top players within two years of winning their NCAA singles titles, and Audra will as well," said former Hurricanes tennis player Melissa Applebaum, who teamed with Cohen to reach the NCAA doubles finals in 2006.

In early June, Cohen also won the prestigious Honda Award as top collegiate player in the nation.

"I can't wait to do well and meet expectations," she said.

She will be a wildcard entry in the U.S. Open in September, and may compete in qualifying at the Rogers Cup tournament in Toronto in August.

Making a difference

Sandie Benitah
20Something

Jewish thoughts on charity have been pretty clear about our responsibilities. It is our duty to give 10 per cent of our livelihood to people who have less to enjoy than we do.

However, it's always been pretty easy to rationalize reasons why at our age, we shouldn't have to. There's that first home we're all saving up for, the Ontario Student Assistance Program (OSAP) debt that still needs to be paid… by no means, we're just not rich enough to give back yet, right?

So wrong.

I'd like to think that the philosophy applies to the poorest of people, as well as the most affluent, and to young people and the older, established crowd.

At my high school graduation, I remember this girl standing on stage receiving one award after another, from working as an aide in Africa and raising money for Kosovo to excelling in her studies.

My friend and I rolled our eyes at each other and joked how this girl was about to get us into a lot of trouble with our own parents, who were watching in the audience. We felt bad that we couldn't make our parents as proud as her parents must have been.

But instead of understanding that we could give back and make a difference despite our young age or our meagre finances, we both dismissed activism as not being our thing.

I know that at some level, I dismissed activism because I didn't want to feel stupid. I knew world issues superficially, and didn't necessarily want to hear a boring lecture on the ramifications of the seal hunt, or whatever was particularly gripping the public at the moment.

I had nothing to contribute, I thought.

But it turns out I didn't need to travel to Africa or have a PhD on a topic to make a difference. All I needed was good intentions.

It took me a while to realize that after a friend of mine, a well-known environmentalist, pretty much laughed in my face when I told him of my plan to raise money for some local environmental groups.

"You just started recycling last year!" he said, laughing.

I felt deeply ashamed, and for a week, I was discouraged enough to quit my plan altogether.

But then I thought about what making a difference really means. Have we only made a difference once our lobbying efforts actually effect political change? Are we only sincerely concerned when we dedicate our life's work to an issue? In other words, do I need to be David Suzuki to care about a healthy planet?

Asking myself these questions, I felt like ditzy Elle Woods in the movie Legally Blonde, as she attempts to move past her sorority lifestyle and get into Harvard law — still insecure but determined.

Determined to raise money and even more determined to break through the elitist air that sometimes develops in activism circles and get back to what giving back really means.

I hate that I grew up to be the type of person that is hypocritically concerned, never moving a finger to make a difference. If so-called activists can't get through to spoiled brats like me, then are they really making a difference at all?

People have more than money to offer. I've got friends selling their art and jewelry to raise money for causes. Another buddy donates her writing and marketing skills to a non-profit group. She learns about the issue with each paragraph she writes, and while she's by no means an expert, she's definitely a valued volunteer.

It's our duty to be compassionate and give back. But it's an activist's duty to encourage us, because if they're preaching to the converted, they're not making a difference at all.

RIGATONI W/BRIE & GRAPE TOMATOES

1 x 12 oz. Brie, rind removed, cut into 1/2" cubes (about 2 cups)
1 pkg grape tomatoes, halved
1/2 c quartered pitted Kalamata olives (optional)
2 large garlic cloves, minced
1/4 tsp dried crushed red pepper
1 c fresh basil leaves, coarsely chopped, plus sprigs for garnish
3/4 lb. rigatoni noodles

With heat OFF, put cheese, tomatoes, olives, garlic, crushed red pepper in large skillet. Stir, separating cheese pieces. Mix in chopped basil. Set aside.

In large pot of boiling salted water, cook pasta until tender but still firm. Drain, reserving 1/2 c cooking liquid. To skillet with cheese mixture, add hot pasta & 1/4 c reserved liquid. Turn on stove; over medium heat, toss until cheese is partially melted and sauce coats pasta, adding more reserved liquid by tablespoonfuls if dry, about 5 min. Transfer to large serving bowl. Garnish with basil sprigs and serve. Yield: 6 servings.

About Life

Dear Ella,

I have a very strong attraction to my personal trainer. We meet three times a week and I count the hours until I can see him again.

Here's the problem: I'm married to a very nice man. We have been married for almost 13 years, and we have two very active boys, ages nine and 11.

My life at home is very routine and boring. I guess you might say I am in a rut. Life with my husband Gary is uneventful. We rarely talk about anything that isn't family-related. I can't remember the last time we went out alone together, and we haven't been intimate in ages, but the worse thing is, I don't care.

When I see Jamie, my personal trainer, I get goose bumps. He has awakened feelings in me that I forgot existed. I haven't acted on any of this yet. I'm still in the fantasy stage.

What am I going to do?

Needs Excitement

Dear Needs Excitement

I'm glad to hear you haven't acted on any of this yet. I don't have to tell you that a successful marriage is a constant work in progress. It's very easy to get caught up in the everyday running of a household while putting your needs on the back burner. Jamie represents freedom and excitement, while Gary represents safety and comfort. Imagine being able to have all this in one package. You can.

You need to satisfy your emotional and physical desires, and what better person to do that with than with the man who loves and adores you – your husband.

Communication and opportunity are two important tools you need to get things back on track with Gary. You need to bring back the passion that you felt before "life" got in the way.

Start with discussing how you are feeling. My guess is that Gary is probably missing the very same things you are. You both need to make time to go away alone, away from your usual surroundings and responsibilities. The two of you need to actively set out on a mission to get back some of the passion that has been replaced by everyday life.

This needs to become your priority. If you need the help of a counsellor, don't be embarrassed. Get it. Remember the most powerful sexual part of a human being is your brain. Use it and rekindle your relationship back to unimaginable heights.

Readers may submit their questions to Ella at The CJN., email: eb@cjnews.com. But Ella is not a professional counsellor. She brings to the questions posed by readers her unique brand of earthy wisdom. Her advice is not a replacement for medical, legal or any other advice. For serious problems, consult a professional.

Let your tzitzit fly in the wind

URBAN WRITER

Are you proud to be Jewish? Are you brave?

I ask because I'm hearing questions from Jewish people I know, such as: "Should I fly the Israeli flag from my balcony?" "Should I wear my kippah in public?" "Should I be as openly Jewish in today's world?"

These questions need to be addressed. I asked them of myself, and positive answers did not roll off my tongue as easily as they might have a couple of years ago.

It's 2007, and there's a smell of fear and discomfort in the Jewish world. I realized this as I gauged my own feelings about the safety of frum Jews walking the streets on Shabbat dressed in their religious garb.

Yet, I don't believe we live in a country that's frothing with hatred for our people. Not at all! I do recognize, however, that for my son, my family and my people, those who are anti-Semitic, and by extension anti-Israel, are gaining a stronger foothold, and, therefore, our level of vigilance must skyrocket.

By vigilance I mean staring anti-Semitism squarely in the face and taking advantage of our freedom to act against it. Let's use our vast resources to ensure that when an extremist group in Vancouver prints venomous hatred toward Jews in a mock-up of a local newspaper, we respond, and respond effectively.

Let's create a treasury of our own and call it "The fight against anti-Semitism pushka" (a pushka is a vessel in which one puts tzedakah – charity). We could use that money to counter the strong organizational and individual efforts of the hateful ones.

To Canadian Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, I say, "Create the fund, and when you do, make sure more than just your own professionals can access it."

If we are to be successful in our efforts to counter those who perpetuate lies against the Jewish people and Israel, it must be through a concerted effort. I have called for this before, yet a true community effort is still not underway.

Ask Jewish students. Quietly, they'll give you the skinny. They are on the front lines of the fight but are vastly under-funded, despite the hyperbole coming from our funding agencies.

It's time we look squarely at our enemies and their intentions, and fight them on the ground.

Don't shy away. It's your chance.

To repeat what I've said before, I'm not suggesting that we're witnessing the rebirth of the old, stodgy, Christie Pits, "None is too many," Jew-hating Toronto – where infamous signs said, "No Dogs and Jews Allowed."

Anti-Semitism does not lie at the core of our society. Canada is not France or England.

I encourage you to wear your kippah proudly, or start wearing one, and to let your tzitzit fly courageously in the wind. Jewish bookstores should create a bumper sticker that reads: "Proud to be Jewish." Wear an "in your face" blue and white button in support of Israel, and fly its distinctive flag from your balcony.

"It's better to be a lion for a day than a sheep all your life," Sister Elizabeth Kenny, an Australian nurse, once said.

To be a Jew is to be bold. This is our way. Men, women, children – be emissaries for our people. We live in Canada. This is the place to spread our good story – to beat down the bad guys and embrace the good folk, to influence the world, to show our valour, and to fight this winnable fight.

This is a movement. It's incumbent on us to get involved.

There is no place to hide. The hiding places are full.

Are you proud to be Jewish? Are you brave?

"He who has courage and faith will never perish in misery."

– Anne Frank

Israelis pioneer green car fuel

By KARIN KLOOSTERMAN
Special to The CJN

TEL AVIV — Biodiesel is the hip, new and responsible car fuel of the 21st century and one of today's hottest biotechnology products.

Environmentalists are enthusiastic about it. Daryl Hannah rides around in her 1983 El Camino making biodiesel seem sexy, while Willie Nelson sings about it and brews his own recipe. Meanwhile, Woody Harrelson says he is "addicted" to it.

Ormat, an Israeli alternative and renewable energy company, is poised to take the use of biodiesel out of the realm of celebrity and environmentalism and into the mainstream. Ormat recently unveiled a new, improved biodiesel formula and expects biodiesel will be in wide use within the next two years.

"We have developed biodiesel which has the same features as conventional diesel, but that can be used in engines with a concentration of 100 per cent biodiesel and without

Nine authors receive Jewish book awards

By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Nine authors and a publisher were honoured with Jewish book awards in Toronto two weeks ago, demonstrating yet again that there is no shortage of books published in Canada that reflect Jewish concerns and themes.

A near-capacity crowd filled the Leah Posluns Theatre for the 19th annual Helen and Stan Vine Canadian Jewish Book Awards ceremony on June 21, showing its appreciation as the authors won in a range of categories, and as guest speaker Robert Fulford spoke on the power of Jewish writing.

The prize for best fiction went to Susan Glickman for The Violin Lover (Goose Lane Editions). Her first novel, it is a tale about a clandestine love affair set in Jewish London in the 1930s against the backdrop of Hitler's escalating campaign against the Jews. A poet and critic, Glickman grew up in Montreal and now lives in Toronto.

As usual, the Holocaust was well represented during the evening, with more than half of the winning titles dealing with some aspect of that theme.

Rosemary Sullivan received the prize for Holocaust history/scholarship for the non-fiction work Villa Air-Bel (HarperCollins Canada). Partially set in Paris in 1940, the book is a meticulous study of a group of high-profile cultural refugees denounced as enemies of the Third Reich – including André Breton, Max Ernst, Marc Chagall and Consuelo de Saint-Exupéry – and the heroic young people who saved them in the Villa Air-Bel, a chateau outside Marseilles.

Eric Koch received the prize for biography/memoir for I Remember the Location Exactly (Mosaic Press), his memoir on growing up in Frankfurt, Germany, between the wars. Writer-artist Bernice Eisenstein won in the Holocaust memoir/literature category for her graphic novel I Was a Child of Holocaust Survivors (McClelland & Stewart); and Carol Matas won in the category of children's and youth literature for Turned Away: The World War II Diary of Devora Bernstein (Scholastic Canada).

Two prominent Yiddishists were honoured for their respective works. Michael Wex was given the prize in scholarship on a Jewish subject for Born to Kvetch: Yiddish Language and Culture in All of Its Moods (St. Martin's Press/ HarperCollins). Unfortunately, the assembly was deprived of hearing some choice Yiddishisms from Wex because he, at the very moment he might have been giving an acceptance speech, was instead winging to Poland for a speaking engagement.

Editor-translator Shirley Kumove received the prize in Yiddish literature and translation from Yiddish for

The News in Brief

CANADA

Shell To Coach RMC

KINGSTON — The Royal Military College (RMC) of Canada has named Adam Shell as head coach of its men's hockey team. A Toronto-area native, Shell has served as assistant coach with McGill University the past two seasons. He also played four years of university hockey at McGill from 1999 to 2003. The RMC Paladins missed the Ontario University Athletics playoffs for the first time in seven years last season. Shell takes over for Jim Hulton, who was named to an assistant coaching position in the Ontario Hockey League.

WORLD

Hotel Returned

ALEXANDRIA — A luxury hotel in Alexandria that had belonged to Jews until it was nationalized by Egypt in 1952 was returned. Founded in 1929 by a French Jewish immigrant, the hotel was seized from the Metzger family in 1952 during Gamal Abdel Nasser's nationalist revolution. Five years later, the Metzgers were expelled from Egypt. Now an 86-room, four-star hotel run by the French company Accor, the Cecil Hotel was returned recently to the Metzger family, then resold to Egypt for an undisclosed amount, Agence-France Presse reported. In its heyday, the Cecil hosted such figures as Winston Churchill, and Al Capone. A 1996 Egyptian court ruling returned the hotel to its Jewish owners, but it was never carried out for fear it would set a precedent for the restitution of nationalized Jewish property in Egypt.

Rice Nixed Bid to Free Pollard: Report

JERUSALEM — Condoleezza Rice reportedly quashed an Israeli proposal in 2005 for Jonathan Pollard to be freed in exchange for a jailed Palestinian militia leader.

On the eve of the Gaza pullout, then-prime minister Ariel Sharon proposed that Israel would free Marwan Barghouti, a Fatah leader jailed for terror attacks but seen as a potential counterweight to Hamas' ascendancy, if the United States in turn released Pollard, Ma'ariv reported June 24. According to the paper, Israel's ambassador to Washington at the time, Danny Ayalon, raised the top-secret proposal with the U.S. secretary of state, but she rejected it. "Pollard's release is out of the question," Ma'ariv quoted her as telling Ayalon. "Danny, I'd advise you not to pursue this any further. Pollard betrayed his country, and that issue is taboo in Washington."

Jonathan Pollard

U.S. officials had no immediate comment on the report, which was consistent with the position of successive U.S. administrations that Pollard, a former U.S. Navy analyst who passed classified information to Israel, should serve out his life prison sentence. Israeli sources confirmed the Sharon government put together a prisoner-swap proposal at the time.

Law Change Backed

WASHINGTON — A coalition of 16 U.S. Jewish groups is backing a proposed provision to the U.S. Terrorism Insurance Act that would keep insurers from withholding insurance based on a client's Israel travel. Insurers often reject travellers who have visited or plan to visit nations on the U.S. State Department's travel warning list, which frequently includes Israel. A letter sent June 27 to the U.S. House of Representatives financial services committee, which is considering renewing the 2002 act, said that "travel in Israel is not statistically more dangerous than travel in the United States" and that the U.S homicide rate is higher than Israel's.

Spy Found Dead

LONDON — A retired Egyptian official who was exposed as one of Israel's top spies has died in Britain. Ashraf Marwan, a former Egyptian intelligence officer and son-in-law of the late president Gamal Abdel Nasser, was found dead outside his London apartment June 27, apparently having fallen from his balcony. Police are investigating. Israeli experts speculated Marwan, 62, may have been assassinated or committed suicide. Egypt has not formally commented on his death. Marwan was a Mossad informant who passed Jerusalem a warning that Egypt planned a surprise attack in October 1973. The information was ignored, and after the ruinous Yom Kippur War, the Mossad chief and his counterpart in military intelligence traded blame over the incident. The case went to court, and Marwan's identity was leaked to the press.

Milestone Reached

ST. PETERSBURG — A Jewish newspaper in Russia marked its 400th issue. Ami, the St. Petersburg bi-weekly, was founded in June 1990 at the height of then-Soviet president Mikhail Gorbachev's Glasnost policies. Yakov Tsukerman, Ami's founder and editor, recalled that the early issues were checked by Soviet censors. The paper's print run of 2,500 copies goes to subscribers in Russia, western Europe, Israel and the United States.

More Aussie Jews?

SYDNEY — The number of Australian Jews rose 5.4 per cent in five years, to 88,801 people, according to Australia's 2006 census. The results, released July 27 by the Australian Bureau of Statistics, showed that more Australians designated Judaism as their faith in the 2006 census, but because religion is the only non-mandatory question in the census, the growth could indicate more willingness to identify as Jewish, rather than Jewish population expansion. Australian Jews generally estimate their community at more than 100,000 people, explaining that many Holocaust survivors dislike disclosing their religion to census takers. Melbourne has 46 per cent of the country's Jews, followed by Sydney, with 41 per cent. The country ranks as the 10th-largest Jewish community worldwide, according to the 2002 World Jewish Population Study. Jews constitute about 0.4 per cent of Australia's 20 million people.

Survivor Pensions Rise

BERLIN — Germany agreed to a cost-of-living pension hike for at least 50,000 Holocaust survivors in Europe. The decision was announced June 27 by the Conference for Jewish Material Claims Against Germany. Negotiators also secured an extra 1,500 pensions for survivors who are or were citizens of certain western European countries. The cost-of-living increase will take effect Oct. 1. Germany will increase monthly payments from $235 to $268 (US) for eligible survivors in the European Union. About 14,500 survivors in non-EU former eastern bloc countries will see their payments increase from $168 to $221.

Families sue for disabled funding in faith schools

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Eight Ontario families and an advocacy group for faith-based schooling are suing the province to force it to fund children with disabilities in private schools in the same way it funds those in public schools.

They allege the province discriminates against students with disabilities in religious private schools by not funding kids with hearing or visual impairments and learning disabilities. Support services for those disabilities are funded in public and Catholic schools through the Ministry of Education, meaning kids in other faith-based schools are not eligible for similar funding.

The families want the Ontario Superior Court to rule that their religious freedom under the Charter of Rights has been violated, and to force the government to fund the same kinds of disabilities in private religious schools that are covered in the public system.

At a Queen's Park press conference last week, lawyers for the families and the Multi-Faith Coalition for Equal Funding of Faith-Based Schools (MFC), which represents Jewish, Sikh, Muslim and non-Catholic Christian education interests, announced they had commenced legal proceedings.

Brian Shell, a lawyer for the eight families, said the case is "a challenge to government to explain why these children [in private religious schools] are provided with none of the in-school supports they would have in public schools. Where is the fairness?"

In 2000, the Conservative government extended support funding to private school and home-schooled students with disabilities.

The Ministry of Health oversees the annual $14.4 million fund, but only private school students who qualify medically for specific special needs – such as speech therapy, occupational therapy and physiotherapy – can get money through the Health Ministry's Community Care Access Centres (CCAC).

But the families and the MFC say the criteria exclude some prominent disabilities.

In a June 26 press release, the coalition said that "the [Liberal] government arbitrarily decided that funding for blind, deaf, and/or children with learning disabilities [in private schools] would not be available since [that support funding] comes from… the Ministry of Education."

David Spencer, a spokesperson for the Ministry of Health, disagreed with the coalition's claim that certain disabilities are not funded by the government, saying his ministry could fund all applicants.

"Anyone can apply to the CCAC for assistance, [but] the need must be identified as medically necessary, as opposed to what [the MFC] is talking about as an 'educational support,'" Spencer told The CJN. "There's no arbitrary line drawn that sets certain disabilities against others. It's a matter of assessment... whether the need that has been identified is medically necessary instead of something needed to assist in an educational setting."

However, another Health Ministry spokesperson said that the "ministry does not fund CCACs to provide services that address the intellectual/developmental, behavioural or learning needs of children."

Missy Hecker and her son, Max Greenberg, 11, attended last week's press conference as one of the eight families named in the lawsuit.

Max, who just finished Grade 5 at Associated Hebrew Schools, was diagnosed with non-verbal learning disorder years ago.

"When Max was in Grade 3, he could barely function in class," Hecker told The CJN. "This wasn't a shortcoming of his school, this was a failing of our government. [The province] has ignored Max's basic rights as a child with a learning disorder."

Hecker estimates it has cost her family around $6,000 dollars to equip her son with scholastic aids such as a laptop computer and digital recorders to help him keep up in school.

She acknowledged her family is financially able to continue sending Max to private school, but wanted to join the lawsuit because "it's the right thing to do."

Musicals at Stratford

From the editor's desk

This season's playbill at the Stratford Festival of Canada reaches back more than eight decades in bringing to the stage the storied musicals My One and Only and Oklahoma.

My One and Only is a music and dance review of the songs written by the then-avante-garde, revolutionary music-makers George and Ira Gershwin. It follows a story based on a book by Peter Stone and Timothy S. Mayer. It premièred in 1983. George, the younger of the two Gershwin brothers, did not live to see the show. He died, alas, at the age of 38 in 1937.

With dazzling fluidity, the show strings together more than a dozen songs that the brothers wrote in the jazzy, Tin Pan Alley, Broadway-belting, flapper-dancing days of the late 1920s and '30s.

Cynthia Dale and Laird Mackintosh

The story takes place in 1927, the year Charles Lindbergh was the first to fly solo across the Atlantic, from continental United States to Paris. Indeed the contest to become the first trans-Atlantic solo pilot is an important part of the tension in the plot.

Billy Buck Chandler, a young testosterone-oozing pilot, falls deeply, if quickly, in love with the beautiful Edythe Herbert, a champion swimmer, star-performer in the extravagant Acquacade dance troupe controlled by the sneering and sinister Prince Nicolai.

But there are major stumbling blocks strewn along the path of the hopeful, burgeoning relationship. Whether pilot and dancer ultimately are able to overcome them resolves only at play's end.

Before we arrive at the play's resolution, however, we feast on non-stop, intricate interlacings of dazzling, colourful dance and song.

The entire troupe stands out. Cynthia Dale, both elegant and delicate, as Edythe, commands the stage whenever she appears. Laird Mackintosh, as Billy, is smooth and charming. Mark Cassius as Mr. Magix is velvety cool as the relaxed, more experienced mentor. Marcus Nance's booming base voice is an arc of compelling sound. And Dayna Tekatch is sneaky smart as Mickey.

Director Michael Lichtefeld has brought to the stage a marvellous frolic of finely imagined, deeply visual work. The costumes are eye-popping and the number of quick changes by the actors and dancers, a tremendous display, in and of itself, of performance magic.

Oklahoma was the first collaboration between Richard Rodgers and Oscar Hammerstein. The famous songwriting duo would go on to write hit after musical hit on Broadway.

Written in 1943, the story of Oklahoma uses the late 19th century in the Wild West territory of mid-United States as a backdrop to explore darker, more complicated human issues. Rogers and Hammerstein confront real situations of human dilemma in the unique manner that became their signature: with thoughtful, poignant music and lyric.

Curly McClain, a cowboy, strives for the affections of Laurey Williams, a farm girl. He wins her over, of course, but it is not a smooth campaign.

The very opening of the play promises the enchantment that follows.

One of the staging sets, which is divided into 14 sections on the wall, wondrously depicts, through lighting, a prairie night sky slowly awakening to day.

Curly, played by Dan Chameroy, enters and sings Oh, What a Beautiful Morning. His voice is controlled and softly melodic.

The song is immediately familiar to baby boomer and older listeners and is the pleasant augury for the rest of the play's toe-tapping or humming-along music.

Blythe Wilson, as Laurey, the strong-willed farm girl is vivacious. The ballet dream scene summons forth strength, agility and composure that characterize her standout performance throughout.

Blythe Wilson and Dan Chameroy

Jonathan Ellul as the schlemiel-like Ali Hakim is superb. David Keeley convincingly portrays the disturbed and troubled Jud Fry. Lindsay Thomas is a sizzling sparkplug as Ado Annie, and Nora McLellan, as Aunt Ellen, the woman with the country smarts, has an edge but a soft-hearted one.

The high-energy, high-stepping dance and compelling broad harmonies of the full ensemble pieces are masterful. Director and choreographer Donna Feore's star shines deservedly as a brilliant light, reflected back to the attention-wrapt audience in the full, breathtaking splendour and seemingly impossible hard work of the entire cast.

Both plays, My One and Only and Oklahoma, as performed by the Stratford Festival's players, are musical and dance entertainment at their highest level.

Toronto's BJE becomes the Mercaz

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

On July 1, the UJA Federation Board of Jewish Education – known as the BJE – officially became the Centre for Enhancement of Jewish Education, or more informally, the Mercaz, which is Hebrew for "centre."

"The name says what the priorities are," Mercaz chair Lou Greenbaum told The CJN at a reception held last week at Beth Tzedec Congregation to celebrate the change, one of four key recommendations, out of a total of 23, to come out of a study released last year on the future of Toronto's Jewish day schools.

The study's other three main proposals were a test loan program for tuition, a $100-million education endowment fund, and a study to examine the idea of creating a community-wide middle school in Vaughan.

The middle school idea was rejected because of lack of support from existing schools, but the test loan program will be implemented some time in the coming year, as soon as the Mercaz' lay leadership structure is organized, the BJE's executive director, Seymour Epstein, told The CJN.

Rabbi Joshua Elkin

As well, the endowment fund – now called the Education Megafund – "will be one of the first priorities of the new administration," he said.

"The truth is, it already exists. There's already a significant amount of money, in the millions of dollars, designated to education."

In a speech at the Mercaz launch, Greenbaum said that without Jewish education, a community has no future. "We need to find ways of making a Jewish education and life experiences more affordable for our young and middle income families – and we need to ensure that the quality of education is enhanced to maintain our position as a world leader."

The Mercaz mandate will include formal and informal education, including adult education. As well, according to its website, the centre is committed to increasing tuition subsidies and exploring new education financing solutions.

"I hope the change will eventuate in increased funding for education, and that the community has seen fit to give this pillar the kind of power it needs to get more work done in terms of quality enhancement," said Epstein, who headed the BJE and will also lead the renamed entity, while retaining his title as federation's senior vice-president of Jewish education and identity.

"You can't really broaden and deepen the commitment without taking on a fiscal commitment as well, and I think over the next few years, we will see that," he said.

As in the past with the BJE, schools will not be accountable to the Mercaz for their quality, but an approach called "quality review and enhancement," to be instituted in all funded institutions, will "allow them to assess their own work," Epstein said.

"There was some element of that [before]. We're now making it systemic and systematic," he said.

The BJE, which was established in 1949 as the Bureau of Jewish Education, has been through several periods of reorganization, outgoing BJE chair Baila Lubek told the event. It now serves more than 70 day and supplementary schools in the Toronto area.

Sandy Brown, a past BJE chair, noted that a 1975 recommendation for preschool subsidy funding still has not been achieved. "I think it's something we need to revisit," she said.

Challenges that were met but still require attention include a need for more and better-trained teachers, and the climbing cost of tuition, Brown said.

Keynote speaker Rabbi Joshua Elkin, executive director of the Boston-based Partnership for Excellence in Jewish Education (PEJE), said that "central agencies like the BJE, now morphing into the Mercaz, are being asked across the country to remake themselves to adapt to changing circumstances."

He said challenges include "the pervasiveness of a majority culture intruding more and more, mostly through technology," the difficulty of finding and reaching large numbers of unaffiliated Jews, and a dearth of "quality" lay and professional leaders.

He credited the Toronto community for its "vision," and challenged the audience of about 130 people to "keep that vision hot, and… push beyond the present."

He added: "We need more people thinking 10 years out."

The rabbi also identified two groups that need to be targeted so that they can "fall in love with Judaism": parents of infants to three-year-olds, and grandparents, a significant number of whom contribute financially to their grandchildren's education.

Israeli official pleased with bilateral trade growth

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

When Ephraim Shoham arrived in Toronto as Israel's trade commissioner four years ago, he quickly learned that the hardest part of his job would be to get Canadian businesses to think of Israel when they considered trading partners.

"The question was exposure, just exposure," he said. "If you look at Canadian statistics, 85 per cent of Canadian exports are to the United States. Forget about Israel. They don't export to other countries."

Changing Israel's image among Canadian business people and exposing them to potential business opportunities became his top priorities.

As he prepares to depart for Israel at the end of his pre-set four-year stint in August, Shoham said he is satisfied he was at least partly successful in facilitating a growing trade relationship between the two countries.

When he arrived in Toronto in 2003, two-way trade was $559 million ($326 million in Israeli exports and $233 million in Canadian sales to Israel – all figures U.S.)

Today, total trade is $951 million, of which $528 million is attributable to Israeli exports and $369 million is the value of Canadian exports.

That's an 80 per cent jump in Israeli exports to Canada and a 50 per cent growth in Canadian sales to Israel, he said, and it doesn't include Israeli exports to Canada via the United States (add 30 per cent to the above figure), nor does it take into account $1 billion a year in Israeli investment in Canadian real estate.

While not all of this increased trade can be laid directly at his doorstep, Shoham is satisfied Israel has taken some giant steps towards meeting the trade potential between the two countries.

Ephraim Shoham

In this equation, Israelis are not so much the problem, he said.

"Israelis have become very international," he explained. "Because Israel is a small marketplace, the majority of Israeli production is focused on exports. We are English-educated. Many of us have been studying in North America, so [difference in business] culture is not an issue anymore.

"The missing point is exposure by Canadians to Israeli opportunities."

Shoham was aided in his goal last year when legendary U.S. investor Warren Buffett paid $4 billion for an 80 per cent stake in Iscar Metalworking Cos., an industry leader in metal-cutting tools, in his first major investment outside the United States.

That put Israel on the global investment map, Shoham said. "Canadian business people heard about the deal, so they know Israel is a place to invest."

Of course Shoham had to do his own selling job, and for help in setting up meetings, he relied on business contacts within the Jewish community, on networking at trade and business shows and on referrals from friends at prominent law firms. He also receives calls and e-mails from Canadian companies seeking advice on Israeli products and technology.

Shoham points to a meeting with Jerry Zucker, the Charleston, S.C.-based owner of the Hudson's Bay Company, that was arranged after the latter's speaking engagement at a UJA campaign event.

Shoham introduced Zucker to a variety of Israeli products that he felt the giant retailer could sell, including cosmetics and other beauty aids, textiles and home products. That meeting led to further meetings with HBC senior managers and purchasing directors, and they have identified seven Israeli companies of interest.

A concrete purchase order has also been received from the Katz Group, which operates the Rexall and Pharma Plus drugstores. The pharmacies have agreed to buy about $1 million in cosmetic products, with that total expected to climb to $5 million in a few years, Shoham said.

Shoham has met with executives of Bombardier – which already does business in Israel, supplying the country's rail locomotives – to convince them to consider Israeli-made aircraft components for the company's aerospace division.

As well, he has promoted venture capital meetings between Israeli and Canadian investors, and he has directed entrepreneurs to a research and development fund established jointly by the governments of Ontario and Israel.

Shoham came to Toronto from a position as director-general of the Industrial Co-operation Authority, a government agency that promotes business between foreign suppliers and Israeli companies.

His boss was Ehud Olmert, Israel's current prime minister who was trade minister at the time. Shoham asked for the Toronto posting, but had to beat a field of 14 other applicants to get the job.

As he contemplates his return to Israel along with his wife Ariela, he has a couple of job offers on the table. Though he won't say what they are, he said, "I would like to continue working in Israel-Canada trade in the private sector."

As for his time in Canada, "I think it was a fantastic period. I travelled all across Canada. This is my best job ever, because of the active work, the variety, the technical products and economic-related activity, and of course, the results."

Tremors in Iran

Two weeks ago, the New York Times published a report about the state of social and economic affairs in Iran that was as shocking as it was revealing. "Iran is in the throes of one of its most ferocious crackdowns on dissent in years, with the government focusing on labor leaders, universities, the press, women's rights advocates, a former nuclear negotiator and Iranian-Americans. The shift is occurring against the backdrop of an economy so stressed that although Iran is the world's second-largest oil exporter, it is on the verge of rationing gasoline."

Three days after the news report appeared, the government of President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad did indeed ration gasoline. Last Tuesday, the Islamic Republic of Iran limited the private consumption of gasoline to 100 litres per month. Taxi drivers are allowed 800 litres per month.

Riots ensued. Some gasoline stations were set ablaze, some banks and businesses were attacked. Three people were reported killed. As of this writing, the unrest had swept unabated into a second day.

But the riots may not only have been in response to the hardships caused by the government's corrupt and inept economic policies. Its harsh, repressive theocratic policies may also be a factor.

The crackdown recorded in the Times entailed public humiliation of fellow Iranians who do not conform to the regime's medieval codes of behaviour that was brutal, sadistic and quite reminiscent of the public humiliations by the brown-shirted thugs of the Nazi party against Jews and other "undesirables" some 70 years ago in the streets of Germany.

"Young men wearing T-shirts deemed too tight or haircuts seen as too western have been paraded bleeding through Tehran's streets by uniformed police officers who force them to suck on plastic jerrycans, a toilet item Iranians use to wash their bottoms… The country's police chief boasted that 150,000 people – a number far larger than usual – were detained in the annual spring sweep against any clothing considered not Islamic."

There is now no doubt that Ahmadinejad is facing growing discontent. He suffered a major setback last December when his party and its candidates fared poorly in local elections. In nine months, he faces crucial parliamentary elections. Before then, however, he will attempt with all his scheming, demagogic might to win his people's favour by scapegoating Israel and the United States for his countrymen's suffering. Many people fear that the rationing of gasoline is merely a way of hoarding scarce fuel for the army to use in the showdown with America that Tehran believes is inevitable.

The public protests are a testament to the courage of the Iranian people. They are also a testament to the effectiveness of stiff, systematic economic sanctions. When the question of further sanctions is debated in the United Nations, we hope the government of Canada will be in the vanguard urging that they be made even tighter.

Tremors of protest are shaking in Iran. Perhaps they may yet cause a spontaneous toppling by the people of their abusive government.

Stranger than fiction

Thanks to modern technology, my cable company now provides me with news in Hebrew straight from Israel. By now, most of us know that Hamas released a tape featuring kidnapped Israeli soldier Cpl. Gilad Shalit ("Hamas plays tape of kidnapped soldier," CJN, June 28). Gilad's father obviously saw the tape as well. A Hamas spokesperson was in the midst of giving an interview when his cellphone rang and it was Noam Shalit, Gilad's father. The strangest conversation ensued.

Protocol would have it that they both inquire about each other's health, and Shalit asked if he could call the Hamas spokesperson again, but off camera. The spokesperson was extremely polite and answered, "Call me anytime. You have my number." I felt as if I was watching a scene from an Alfred Hitchcock movie. It was unbelievable, almost surreal. As a parent, I know Shalit's heart was breaking and he probably wanted to scream; however, his composure was admirable and also unbelievable. The entire episode must have lasted only a moment or two, but I can tell you that it made a lasting impression on me. It was truly stranger than fiction.

Threatened boycott attacks all universities

The proposed boycott of Israel by the British University and College Union goes against the fundamental university values of freedom of expression and free circulation of ideas ("Response to U.K. boycott threat," CJN, June 14). To attempt to limit the ability of Israeli universities to freely engage in scholarship and teaching with other sister institutions in the world is attacking all universities at their core mission. Acts of exclusion, such as those proposed by the British University and College Union, will only further exacerbate existing tensions. I urge my fellow British university colleagues to oppose this potentially disastrous and deplorable move. Scholarly understanding and free academic exchange and expression can only contribute to a peaceful resolution of conflicts.

Response to Rabbi Tanenbaum

In his column, Rabbi Roy Tanenbaum argues that what professors Steven Cohen and Arnold Eisen have termed the sovereign self "feels free to approach Judaism with his or her own sense of authority and with no sense of communal or divine boundaries" ("Dethroning the sovereign self," CJN, June 21). This phenomenon is a growing trend in American Jewish society and is in opposition to accepting "heavenly sovereignty," by which one can be measured as a "good Jew" or a "poor Jew."

As a secular Jew, I firmly believe that what our society needs today is not a sense of "Divine commandedness" but rather a sense of collective introspection. In our modern society, personal authority has been constantly eroding due to the influences of religion, commercialism and scientific materialism. I do not have a problem with the idea of believing in something beyond oneself. I can actually see a reverence for God or for the divine as laid out in biblical and rabbinic texts as a potential source of liberation. But I would subordinate such a belief to a strong conviction and knowledge of self.

If one is familiar with the notions of "teenage angst" or "middle age crisis," one can begin to understand that the "sovereign self" is really part and parcel of the human condition when personal sovereignty is allowed to blossom.

Perhaps there is something to the notion that many American Jews worship themselves and are in this sense idolaters. However, the corrective is not indoctrination but education.

German-Jewish History Awards

Today's Germans are dealing with their country's horrible past in a constructive manner. Thousands of them have made extraordinary contributions to preserving vestiges of former Jewish life in their local communities, including historical records, cultural material, cemeteries and synagogues. They carry out such activities as volunteers because they feel it is the right thing to do – the preservation of Jewish material is one of the few ways in which they can respond constructively.

On Jan. 24, 2008, five Germans will receive the Obermayer German-Jewish History Awards in the Berlin Parliament. They will be selected by a jury of seven eminent and knowledgeable individuals, based on nominations to be submitted by Sept. 20, 2007. The call for nominations can be found at www.obermayer.us/award. A hard copy of the call for nominations can be requested from the German-Jewish Community History Council, 239 Chestnut St., West Newton, Ma., 02465, U.S.A. or by e-mailing germanaward@hotmail.com.

First Blair, now Brown

By VANESSA BULKACZ
JTA

After Tony Blair was elected prime minister of Great Britain a decade ago, he proved himself to be a friend of Jews and of Israel, a position that at times has caused him trouble within his own Labour party.

Now, with Blair stepping down this week as prime minister, the question arises: will his successor, Gordon Brown, be as solidly behind the Jewish state and the British Jewish community?

The transition comes as British Jews are feeling increasingly under attack. Several trade unions, long allied with the Labour party, have spearheaded efforts to boycott Israel.

And a report last February published by the Community Security Trust, which represents the Jewish community on matters of anti-Semitism, terrorism, policing and security, showed anti-Semitic incidents in the United Kingdom at record levels since documentation began in 1984.

Despite the tense atmosphere, Jewish leaders here praise Blair for his commitment to their issues.

"Since becoming prime minister in 1997, the Jewish community has been able to look on Mr. Blair as a friend and ally, addressing our concerns and defending our interests both domestically and on the international stage," the president of the Board of Deputies of British Jews, Henry Grunwald, said in a statement.

Blair will continue to play a role in the international arena – last Wednesday he was to be named the special envoy to the Middle East for the Quartet, the diplomatic grouping of the United States, Russia, the European Union and the United Nations.

Beyond the Middle East, the Board of Deputies points to more than a dozen new state-aided Jewish schools, an increase in funding for Holocaust education and the establishment of Holocaust Memorial Day as examples of Blair's positive record.

Responding to a parliamentary inquiry into the rising tide of anti-Semitism in the United Kingdom, the British government made 35 recommendations recently to combat what one official called "the absolute scourge of our society."

Tony Blair

Blair visited Israel several times a year in attempts to boost the peace process. He appointed Lord Levy, one of his inner circle advisers, as Middle East envoy.

A year ago, in a meeting with Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Blair proclaimed that "relations between Britain and Israel have never been better or deeper."

While Blair's unflagging support of Israel has produced accolades from the Jewish community, it has brought aggravation from his party.

Yet even during predictions of, and requests for, his departure – largely over issues in the Middle East – Blair offered the keynote address at Labour Friends of Israel's annual conference in September.

In his remarks, Blair said that Israel wants to know that "other countries in the region respect its desire to live in peace and are prepared to recognize the most basic and fundamental thing, which is its right to exist. And I believe that is a reasonable position for Israel to adopt."

This understanding in the face of mounting opposition from party members and the public did not go unrecognized by supporters of the Jewish state.

Jane Kennedy, a member of Parliament and chair of Labour Friends of Israel, told JTA that Blair has had enormous success in terms of Britain's relationship with Israel.

Even some in the opposing party bestow accolades.

"There's no doubt that Blair gets it in terms of Israel," Stuart Polak, director of Conservative Friends of Israel, told JTA. "He understands and is a great supporter."

Blair has cited the Israeli-Palestinian conflict as one of the biggest challenges facing the international community, and last year he vowed publicly to use his final months in office to try to secure peace.

His new post as special envoy will be based in Jerusalem, with a potential second office in the West Bank.

The Israeli government approves the idea of Blair as envoy.

As for Brown, who is taking over as head of the Labour party, observers believe he will maintain his predecessor's strong relationship with Israel and the Jewish community.

As chancellor of the Exchequer, Brown has consistently provided increased levels of funding for Holocaust education. In his keynote speech at a recent dinner of the Board of Deputies, he praised the Jewish community for overcoming challenges "from discrimination and racism to terrorism and security" and emerging stronger than ever "precisely because you are built on the greatest and strongest of foundations. Your ethos is the living embodiment of community in action."

Brown reportedly is also a confidante of Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks, a relationship that appeared to strengthen after their fathers died within a short period of each other. Brown's father was apparently a strong influence in his connection to Jewish and Israeli issues.

In an interview with Time magazine last May, Brown said his father "used to visit Israel twice a year, so I learned quite a lot about the Middle East."

Brown already has visited the Middle East several times. And among the new cabinet members he announced last week were prominent pro-Israel and pro-Jewish politicians.

Labour Friends of Israel, for one, has no fears about Brown replacing Blair.

"I have found him to be very well informed, personally committed to supporting Israel and very keen to help in bringing about the lasting settlement that we all want to see," Kennedy said.

Gordon Brown

And as the voice of Britain's Jewish community, the leadership of the Board of Deputies is "delighted" by the prospect of Brown's imminent prime ministership.

"We were delighted that when Gordon Brown spoke at the recent Board of Deputies President's Dinner, he reiterated his pledge to fight anti-Semitism," Grunwald told JTA. He said they were encouraged by his comments that the Jewish community "does not cause anti-Semitism and it must not fall on them to have to defeat it."

He also said, 'I recoil in revulsion at the prospect of boycotts of Israel and the Israeli academic community.'"

What Tony Blair brings to his new role

By RON KAMPEAS
JTA

WASHINGTON — Tony Blair brings a lot to his new job as a peace envoy: his hands-on experience as British prime minister in dealing with Middle East issues; the confidence U.S. President George W. Bush places in him as a loyal supporter of the Iraq war; and a long-held view that resolving the Israeli-Palestinian conflict is vital to stabilizing the region.

The question in this case is whether "a lot" constitutes useful experience or debilitating baggage.

Israeli and Palestinian leaders are welcoming, if a little wary of Blair, whose new role was announced last Wednesday. Blair will be the envoy of the Quartet, the diplomatic grouping of the United States, Russia, the United Nations and the European Union.

"Blair comes with baggage on the Arab side of having done Iraq," said Stephen Cohen, a scholar with the Israel Policy Forum, referring to Blair's lockstep involvement with Bush in pursuing the war, now seen as a destabilizing debacle.

"On the Israeli side," Cohen continued, "he comes with the baggage of someone who has supported the idea of linkage" of the Israeli-Palestinian problem to reforming the Middle East, "and Israel is afraid of linkage."

Blair has consistently linked Israeli-Palestinian peace to broader Middle East stability, something that officials in Jerusalem resent because of the burden it places on them.

However, Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert endorsed the new appointment when he met with President Bush recently.

Miri Eisin, Olmert's spokesperson, has said that Israel is "very supportive of Prime Minister Blair and of his continuing involvement in the Middle East and the peace process."

Still, some of Olmert's advisers are believed to see a Blair appointment as dangerous. Bush until now has been unquestionably pro-Israel, but he also trusts Blair implicitly. The worry is that Blair could nudge Bush into pressuring Israel into making security concessions to allow greater freedom of movement for the Palestinians.

The Palestinian Authority leadership also has welcomed Blair's appointment, partly for the same reasons as Olmert. Both Olmert and P.A. President Mahmoud Abbas are weak because of military debacles – Olmert because of Israel's failure to crush Hezbollah in last summer's Lebanon war, Abbas because of the Hamas victory against forces loyal to Abbas' Fatah Party last month in the Gaza Strip.

Both are looking for a dramatic way out of the political wilderness.

Blair's mandate will be to build institutions and economic capacity among the Palestinians. American officials say he will not deal with final-status issues.

Blair may have won over Abbas, but he has a credibility problem in the Palestinian street, said Samar Assad, who directs the Palestine Center, a Washington-based think tank.

Cohen, the IPF analyst, said Blair's performance is ultimately less important than that of his Israeli and Palestinian interlocutors.

"The problem is not the baggage, but if they're willing to travel," Cohen said. "If they were willing to travel, he could carry the baggage."

On supporting Israel

Recently, a friend noted that it was hard to find a non-governmental organization that was not pro-Palestinian/anti-Israel. Why? Why are those two ideological positions wedded? How did Israel become everybody's "bad boy"? How can western liberals so easily blame the victims of suicide bombings?

Norma Baumel Joseph in Montreal

We have witnessed a strange transformation in public opinion and media attention. Israel was once seen as the underdog, its heroes praised globally. Its success in the Six Day War, its rescue at Entebbe, its losses at Munich were shared throughout the democratic world. It is too facile to say that once it started winning it lost public support. It is frightening to say that it is all a familiar anti-Semitic narrative.

It is equally incorrect to say that Israel and Israelis are totally innocent of any wrongdoing. The government made mistakes and is guilty of many human and political flaws. Equally, some Israelis are racist. Arabs living in Israel are not integrated in social and political spheres.

But the comparison of Israeli and Palestinian acts is highly problematic, even patently treacherous. This is not two sides of one coin. The tactics and methods of Palestinian representatives are contemptible. Israel does not intentionally attack civilian positions or use suicide bombers. It does not kidnap, torture and hide enemy soldiers.

Significantly, Jews from Arab countries were not left in transit camps to fester. The ma'abarot were dreadful, but the hundreds of thousands of Jews who were forced to flee their homes were able to rise to positions of power and respect. Israel did not hold them hostage to political barter. The Arab world, regrettably, has done this to the Palestinian refugees. Sympathy aside, we cannot condone global memory loss of the real political context and its ugly reality. We know who is guilty, and it is not Israel.

Palestinian support should not equal condemnation of Israel. Ironically, we support the needs of a people for a homeland. One can sympathize with those who live in abject poverty and have been mistreated by their corrupt representatives. That does not equate with accepting all their rhetoric of political ideology and destruction. Only the simple-minded seek absolute polarities and follow the reasoning that if I am right, then you are wrong. Liberal principles of democracy, justice and freedom should be reinvested in this controversy. Understanding of causes or sympathy for the participants cannot excuse wrongful and lawless acts. No matter the scenario, no matter the background, suicide bombers and civilian murderers are guilty!

Israel has been held accountable to a very high standard of morality and legitimate action. Good, but be fair. That same standard of justice and lawfulness should be applied to any Palestinian group that claims to speak on behalf of the Palestinian people. Demand it!

The way of all the Earth

The last issue of the Smithsonian magazine had an article about Petra, the great Nabatean rock city in Jordan. You may recall its façade from Indiana Jones and the Last Crusade, as the cave where the evil Nazi came to grief. The film was deliciously silly, the city itself anything but.

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

Someday I may actually get to see the place, even though every effort on my part has been frustrated by: flooded wadis (the first attempt); war (twice); illness (my fault). In the meantime, I have to make do with magazines.

But what in this edition caught my eye was a sidebar article about the Tomb of Aaron (in Arabic, Jebel Haroun), a small whitewashed domed building two hours' donkey ride from Petra, where Aaron, the brother of Moses, is supposed to have been buried. The tomb itself was built in the fourth century and renovated by a 13th-century Egyptian sultan. The Bedouin guide to the writer maintained that Muslim, Christian and chassidic pilgrims travel to this site to pay their respects.

According to the article, "The Old Testament [sic] relates that, at God's command" this is where "Aaron was left naked to die of exposure at the top of the mountain for a lack of deference to the Lord."

Leaving aside the fact that the biblical account is hardly that draconian, it seems that we cannot escape our human need to locate the graves of our patriarchs – and matriarchs – somewhere on Earth so that we can commune with their spirits, if not their actual physical being.

Why is it that we need to commemorate the dead with tomb monuments that become sites of worship? I am strongly reminded of the tomb of David on the Mount of Olives, its interior covered in candle wax (or was last time I was there), women beseeching the once and future king for their heart's desire. I don't believe that David is actually buried there – more likely the Muslim-style tomb protects the body of a Crusader or a Muslim holy man. But the aura given to it by the weight of human prayer can't help but have an effect on one in that close, smoky atmosphere.

As archeologists literally dig deeper into the past, they find that at a very early stage – Neanderthal it seems – humans began to consciously bury their dead with ritual and ceremony, rather than plopping them in the earth and moving on.

In death as in life, there was little equality. The high ranks got the best of grave goods and, when monuments were erected, the best pyramids, obelisks, stone cairns and so on.

How wise, then, the Jewish way of burial and remembrance. In my community, the richest and the poorest, the most famous and the most obscure, all get the same plain pine box. All are tended by the chevrah kadishah, all commemorated with modest gravestones. Well, at least today. Some monuments in the older section of the cemeteries are rather grand, but nothing like the mausoleums in other cemeteries.

We visit the graves of our ancestors before the High Holy Days. What do we want to tell them? Can they appreciate our attention? Who knows? We humans continue to hope that somehow, somewhere, someone is listening.

The most moving yizkor I ever attended was not the usual drone of psalms and readings about the brevity of life. The service was simple. "There are many things," the rabbi said, "that we may have wanted to tell those whom we remember today, but in life never got the chance. Today is your chance to take time and silently say to them what in life went unsaid."

That was all. We stood silently, and as the tears began, we spoke in our hearts to those who, in life, were closest to us, most beloved. Yet some of our heart's deepest thoughts were never spoken. Was it for them, or for ourselves, that we wept? I don't know. I only know that in those moments a more lasting monument was created to our lost beloved, one that will endure longer than the whitewashed domes, longer than the graves themselves.

Jewish demographics and continuity

Two major issues facing Jewish communities throughout the world are growth and continuity. When examining the projected demography of the Canadian population over the next decade, this is of particular concern for Canadian Jews. Although the actual numbers may appear higher than they are today, when compared to other religious minorities, the relative proportion of the Jewish community is on the decline.

Gerald L. Gall in Edmonton

Statistics Canada recently released population projections for the year 2017 as they relate to Canada's religious demographics. These projections are neither particularly dramatic nor surprising; however, they do point to three general conclusions.

First, the number of persons in some religious minorities will increase substantially. This is essentially a result of immigration patterns at present and projected into the future. For example, there will be an increasingly greater number of Muslims, Sikhs, Hindus and Buddhists in Canada in the year 2017.

Secondly, for some other religious minorities, there will be a decline in their relative numbers. For example, since there are very few Jewish immigrants to Canada, the proportion of those in Canada's Jewish minority will decline compared to other religious minorities.

Thirdly, in 2017, the Christian population in Canada will still constitute a significant majority but will do so in an increasingly smaller proportion when compared to the entire Canadian population.

Most of the foregoing will largely occur in the large urban centres throughout Canada.

"The number of individuals who identified themselves as Jewish [in the last census] increased 3.7 per cent during the 1990s to nearly 330,000," Statistics Canada reports.

"They accounted for 1.1 per cent of the population in 2001, virtually unchanged during the decade. Well over one-half of these individuals, about 190,800, lived in Ontario.

"According to the census, nearly one-third (31 per cent) of people of Jewish faith in 2001 were born outside Canada. However, Jewish people accounted for only one per cent of the 1.8 million immigrants who came to Canada during the 1990s."

What then is the significance of these population figures and projections? There is, of course, a legal consequence. Predictably, there may be an increase of minority religious assertions in the courts, and/or greater instances of so-called "reasonable accommodation," to adjust social norms to the needs of religious minorities. In turn, this might lead to a backlash as a result of frustration, perhaps some intolerance or simply a sense of fatigue experienced by the majority population.

More importantly, however, Jewish communities have always been aware of the need to sustain numbers and encourage growth. Our religion does not advocate proselytization or active recruitment of new members. But there are things we can do.

We can educate our children about our history and culture to give them a solid background in their heritage. We can encouraging our youth to attend programs such as Jewish summer camps, the birthright experience and the teens and twenties programs offered by synagogues or Jewish community centres throughout Canada. Young persons hopefully can look to their Jewish background as an inspiration and a guide to everyday life. The importance of these initiatives is underscored by the number of Jews in each generation who reject their faith and traditions and turn elsewhere, or nowhere, for a source of guidance that our community can provide.

There is also the issue of acceptance and inclusion. All branches of Judaism must accept, with respect, all other branches of our faith. It is not simply a matter of tolerance but rather an issue of inclusion of all who embrace the essentials of our tradition.

We must also be accepting and welcoming of those who convert to Judaism. Those who choose Judaism have engaged in much thought, introspection and education before making this major life decision. These persons are not strangers among us but are integral members of our faith and communities.

Another important issue is that of intermarriage. Many of us would prefer if our children would choose spouses or partners who are also Jewish. While this is not always possible, we can encourage them to raise their families in homes that will provide continuity to our faith and traditions.

The Statistics Canada projections for 2017 should encourage us to foster a robust, healthy community that will endure throughout the future. This is the challenge that confronts all of us who share the view that our continuity and growth are essential to the vitality of the Jewish community and Canada as a whole.

Palestinian rift widens after fighting in Gaza

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Commentators in Israel, harking back to the Altalena incident during the War of Independence, have long maintained that the Palestinian national movement needs to submit itself to a painful period of violent internal strife before it can unite and make peace with Israel. It is an interesting theory, but is it valid?

The Altalena affair occurred about a month after the proclamation of Israeli statehood on May 14, 1948. Although it left a residue of bitterness and resentment, it ultimately facilitated a spirit of unity in the new Jewish state at a time when its very existence was threatened by a coalition of Palestinian paramilitaries and Arab armies attempting to roll back the November 29, 1947 United Nations Palestine partition plan.

Prior to 1948, the Jewish community in Palestine, the Yishuv, was protected by an agglomeration of distinct militias – ranging from the middle-of-the-road Haganah and the Palmach to the right-wing Irgun and Etzel – torn by ideological fissures. With statehood, they agreed to amalgamate themselves into the newly formed Israel Defence Force. As a result of serious communications lapses, Etzel broke the agreement and dispatched the Altalena, a ship brimming with fighters and weapons, to Israel. Catching wind of the plot, David Ben-Gurion, Israel's first prime minister, ordered the vessel to be intercepted and its cache of arms seized. During the ensuing fighting off the coasts of Kfar Vitkin and Tel Aviv, 16 Irgun combatants and three Israel Defence Forces soldiers were killed. By then, Ben-Gurion had made his point. There was only one central government and challenges to its authority, however flagrant or mild, would not be tolerated.

Ismail Haniyeh of Hamas

Recalling the Altalena incident as a pivotal moment in Israeli nation building, pundits in Israel observed that the fractured Palestinians needed to pass through an identical blood-letting process before they could achieve a semblance of unity and effectiveness of purpose.

Although they are one people, share the same culture and language, are bound together by a historical memory of having been dispossessed of their homes and lands in what is now Israel, and uniformly detest Israel's occupation of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, the Palestinians have always been splintered in terms of religion, class and political affiliation. These differences surfaced with a vengeance after the formation of Hamas – the Islamic Resistance Movement – in the first weeks of the Palestinian uprising in 1987 and during the first phase of the Oslo process, when, in deference to Israel, Fatah temporarily hammered Hamas in a wave of arrests.

But with Hamas' surprising victory over Fatah in the January 2006 parliamentary election in the Palestinian Authority, these pent-up tensions boiled over. Hamas, which pointedly questions Israel's right to exist and has carried out a succession of suicide bombings in Israel, invited Fatah to join the new government. Fatah declined, refusing to share power. Hamas established a government headed by Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh. Since he refused to recognize Israel and renounce terrorism, the new Palestinian regime was boycotted and subjected to economic sanctions by Israel and the international community. Last winter, following a round of serious fighting pitting Hamas against Fatah, Haniyeh and the Fatah-aligned president of the Palestinian Authority, Mahmoud Abbas, met in Mecca, Saudi Arabia, to resolve their bitter differences and head off the prospect of a civil war.

Both sides hoped that a unity government, in which Hamas would hold the largest number of cabinet seats, could persuade foreign powers such as the United States, France, Canada and Russia to end their debilitating boycott of the Palestinian government. The Palestinians, ruled by a dysfunctional two-headed regime which clashed over vital issues, failed to break the global boycott. The reason was abundantly clear. Hamas stubbornly adhered to its hardline positions on Israel and terrorism, and a power struggle ensued. Internecine fighting erupted in Gaza, a depressed area of 1.5 million inhabitants whose population is reliant on food aid and which Israel unilaterally jettisoned in 2005. The battles degenerated into outright civil war last month. Having routed Fatah after five days of skirmishes, during which several fighters were thrown off highrise buildings, Hamas took control of Gaza and thus ended Fatah's domination of Palestinian politics.

Shocked by the outcome, Abbas disbanded the unity government, dismissed Haniyeh and replaced him with Salam Fayyad, a moderate and respected economist and former World Bank official who served as finance minister under Haniyeh. Fayyad formed an emergency government in the West Bank, a Fatah stronghold. Hamas has condemned Fayyad's government as illegitimate, but Israel, Egypt and Jordan have backed Fatah to the hilt. For their part, the United States and the European Union have funnelled financial assistance to the Fatah faction while keeping Hamas isolated. Buoyed by this outpouring of support, Abbas outlawed Hamas' armed wing, banned all contacts with top Hamas officials and issued a stinging denunciation of Hamas as "murderous terrorists."

Due to these developments, the Palestinians have finally experienced their "Altalena." But unlike the Israelis almost 60 years ago, the Palestinians have neither stepped back from the brink nor closed ranks in the face of crisis, and are now more divided than ever. With Gaza and the West Bank having separated and become warring entities, the whole future of a two-state solution as a means by which to defuse the Arab-Israeli conflict is now in doubt.

Cut off economically and diplomatically, with Israel and Egypt having sealed their respective border crossings into Gaza and only permitting vital supplies through, Hamas has been scrambling to minimize the damage by appealing for Palestinian unity. Hamas has called for a national dialogue and the formation of a new Palestinian Authority made up of independent technocrats. In an op-ed piece in the New York Times on June 20, Ahmed Yousef, Haniyeh's political adviser, wrote, "We reject attempts to divide Palestine in two parts..." Fatah, having accused Hamas of carrying out a "coup" in Gaza, has rebuffed Hamas' overtures, threatened to seek new elections without its participation and continued to attack Hamas institutions and harass and arrest its functionaries in the West Bank.

Meanwhile, in reaction to the firing of Qassam rockets at Israeli settlements, Israel has exerted military pressure on Hamas through shallow pinprick raids into Gaza.

In response to these developments, one of Hamas' most influential and radical figures, Mahmoud Zahar, has accused Fatah of collaborating with the United States and Israel and declared that Hamas may yet try to seize the West Bank. This is not a farfetched scenario, given the fact that Hamas – which is supported by Iran and Hezbollah across the board – is better organized and more disciplined than Fatah. Indeed, Fatah's former strongman in Gaza, Mohammed Dahlan, has said that Fatah would be defeated in a pitched battle in the West Bank unless it undertakes "serious reforms." Fatah has been bolstered by infusions of U.S. arms through Egypt, but these shipments obviously had no effect on the recent fighting in Gaza.

Hoping to capitalize on the current situation, Abbas has called for a resumption of peace talks with Israel, saying that the advent of Palestinian statehood under Fatah's auspices could be effective in undermining Hamas' appeal. "We need to deliver the end of the occupation, a Palestinian state," Abbas' aide, Saeb Erekat, said recently. At last week's summit in Sharm el Sheikh hosted by Egypt and attended by Israel, Jordan and Fatah representatives, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert blithely ignored these admonitions and rejected the idea of entering into final status negotiations.

Instead, he offered a package of "goodwill gestures," promising to release 250 of 10,000 Palestinian prisoners, hand over a portion of the $700 million worth of Palestinian tax revenues that have been frozen since 2006, and confer with Abbas on a regular basis.

But these "gestures" will fall short of propping up Abbas.

Lucy Cohen retires from USDS

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

After 11 years as an administrator at United Synagogue Day Schools, Lucy Cohen has retired as head of school.

Growing up in Montreal, where she immigrated at age 5, she envisioned a career as a foreign correspondent, but a stint in Israel that began at age 18 changed her mind.

"I was inspired by what I observed of the education program in the kibbutz," she said in an interview at her office at USDS's Bayview branch shortly before the school year ended last month. She explained that, on the kibbutz, everything that was taught was integrated around a core theme and the focus was on facilitating children's development in a way that made learning enjoyable. "It resonated enough that I felt it was something I wanted to do, not just espouse."

In her childhood home, "education was paramount," recalled the daughter of Holocaust survivors who was born in Siberia toward the end of World War II. Cohen's 95-year-old mother, who trained as a couturière in Warsaw, and her late father worked in the garment business, but dinner conversations revolved around literature and ideas, said Cohen.

An alumna of the Jewish People's Schools (now the Jewish People's Schools & Peretz Schools, or JPPS), of Baron Byng High School and McGill University, Cohen entered McGill at age 16 to study philosophy and literature, but left for Israel two years later on Habonim Dror's kibbutz hachshara program.

A projected one-year stay turned into 3½ years, during which she married kibbutznik Moshe Cohen and had a daughter.

After the family returned to Montreal, Cohen completed her bachelor's degree and attended Jewish teaching seminary. Her husband – a businessman who died suddenly of a bacterial infection on a trip to Toronto in 1993 – attended university at night and worked during the day following their move to Canada.

Cohen, who has a master's degree in the philosophy of education from McGill, was the first Canadian to complete a Jerusalem Fellowship – a three-year leadership development program of the Mandel Institute in Israel.

Before moving into administration at JPPS in Montreal, Cohen taught autistic children, then worked as a high school guidance counsellor. As a graduate student, she taught part time at JPPS and took teacher training at McGill. Once she had her master's degree, she taught both Jewish and general studies at the day school.

Cohen segued into administration after her fellowship sabbatical in the 1980s, working her way up to director of education, the position she left when she came to Toronto in 1996.

She has been a presenter at various conferences, and for the past six summers has been a mentor at the Jewish Theological Seminary's William Davidson Graduate School of Jewish Education's day school leadership training institute, where she will also spend this summer.

Lucy Cohen

As well, she plans to do some consulting work during her retirement.

Cohen's move to Toronto to become USDS' director of education (the title was later changed) was prompted by both personal and professional reasons. Her daughter – now a mother of five in New York – was living here at the time, and, on a professional level, Cohen has always enjoyed new challenges, she said.

She said her focus was on "bringing things from theory into practice."

Among the challenges she faced at USDS, Cohen includes demographic changes in the Toronto Jewish community (a significant Jewish population growth in Vaughan, just north of the city) that resulted in plans for the school to become part of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's new Lebovic campus. The plans have been delayed and will likely be scaled down for financial reasons.

Finances were also behind the decision to sell the Richmond Hill branch and move its students to the Bayview branch at the end of last year, presumably on a temporary basis until the new northern branch was completed. The move was not popular among branch parents.

Although Cohen regrets having had to close the northern branch, she said her focus was on making the move as smooth as possible for the 134 students who moved to the Bayview branch. There has been "a smooth integration of the two student populations," she said.

In March of last year, Cohen also faced a considerable challenge dealing with angry parents who learned that there was mould in some classrooms at the Richmond Hill branch and they had not been informed. "As in any enterprise, if you're the head, no matter what happens, you always have to take responsibility," Cohen told The CJN.

On a more positive note, she has instituted several changes at the school including a preschool educational system that focused on the individual child, including the notion of multiple intelligences at a time when that was not prevalent, she said.

More recently, this past year, she introduced a middle school program for students with no previous formal Jewish education, and a program for grade 1 and 2 students who require individual attention to strengthen their math and literary skills so that they can gradually be integrated with their classmates.

"I'm a big-picture person," said Cohen. "I pay a lot of attention to detail... but always in the context of the big picture."

COMPLETING THE DREAM

New treatment 'turns back the memory clock'

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

As an undergraduate student, Norman Doidge, a local psychiatrist and psychoanalyst, became intrigued with the idea that the brain can change and grow.

Norman Doidge

Author of The Brain that Changes Itself: Stories of Personal Triumph from the Frontiers of Brain Science, Doidge said that the prevailing idea that the brain is similar to a complex machine does not do it justice.

"Machines are inanimate; and the brain is alive. As we learn, the brain can change structure and improve function."

If it sounds too good to be true, "it is because of old notions. The liver, skin and blood all replenish themselves. Why did we miss the fact that the brain is plastic?"

People with brain damage were often given a poor prognosis, he said, because scientists thought of the brain as a machine that could not grow new parts. Many important thinkers observed the rigidity of human behaviour and assumed mistakenly that the brain was rigid.

Researchers have discovered the neuroplasticity of the brain, however, and have learned that "not only is it not rigid, it is malleable and can be changed right into a person's old age. Plasticity exists from cradle to grave."

Doidge, who is also an essayist and poet, is on the faculties of University of Toronto's department of psychiatry and the Columbia University Centre for Psychoanalytic Training and Research in New York. He worked on the 425-page book for about three years, he said, until the ideas became "crystal clear. I wanted it to be for anyone who has a curious mind. You don't have to be a brain surgeon to read it. I wrote to a person who has no background. I had a good editor, and he had me write things over and over again to make sure the ideas were simplified."

What neuroplasticity means is that our memories do not have to decline as we age, said Doidge. "The reason they do decline is because it is a 'use it or lose it' brain."

In one example he talks about Stanley, a doctor who practised medicine until he was in his mid-80s. "He began to notice that he was having trouble remembering some words so he did some [mental] exercises that are described in the book and after six weeks his memory improved, his speech flowed, and even his driving improved. It is pretty amazing.

"This program not only preserves memory, but it turns back the memory clock, so people can actually improve."

In another example, a surgeon in his 50s who suffered an incapacitating stroke took part in a clinic that used the principles of neuroplasticity. He was set to work cleaning tables with his bad arm, while his good arm was immobilized. At first, he found it impossible, but gradually the arm "remembered" its skills, and he learned to write and play tennis again.

Doidge said he has countless examples of people with learning disabilities who have learned to compensate by working around their weakness with supports such as tape recorders and computers.

"When you work around weak areas, you neglect them and they waste away. We now have a whole new class of treatment that works on strengthening weak brain areas.

"This treatment is so new that it is not yet used in most school systems, but I suspect that [eventually] there will be a revolution in education. Instead of giving kids computers with great memories, educators will train kids to use their own memories."

Neuroplasticity is one of the most important changes in the study of brain science in 400 years, said Doidge, "and this is one of the first books to show the comprehensive sweep of its implications."

Not only can it be applied to clinical conditions, it can also be applied to understanding emotions and human nature, he said. "It deals with [such things as] creativity, love relationships, addictions, obsessions, anger and grief.

"The brain can think itself into ruts, but we can create roadblocks that steer it back in the right direction."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING
The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

The CJN makes no representation as to the kashruth of food products in advertisements.

Make a stand for peace

By RABBI AVRAM ROTHMAN

Rabbinic Reflections

In this week's parshah of Pinchas, we find that HaShem rewards Pinchas for his actions, saying "Behold I have given to him [Pinchas] My covenant of peace." If one knows the story of Pinchas, who was a son of Aaron the kohen, one would have to wonder about this gift of peace given to Pinchas. After Pinchas has committed a violent act, killing two people, one would be hard-pressed to believe that he should receive the "covenant of peace."

Rather, I would think that this award should go to Aaron, the "lover of peace and seeker of peace," and instead Pinchas should receive an award for zealotry. Yet the Midrash states that "it is only correct and proper that Pinchas should receive this award for peace!" How can we reconcile such a strange thing?

It is said in the name of the sainted Rabbi Chaim Soleveitchik that people have a misconception about the meaning of "peace." They believe peace means that no matter what happens, there should be tranquillity and there should not be any fights.

However, Rabbi Soleveitchik explains, that this is not the meaning of "shalom" (peace). The word shalom is derived from the word "shalem" (perfection). Shalom really means perfection – the ultimate right. The ultimate right is perfection not only between all Jews, but also between the Almighty and the Jewish People.

When a husband and wife are acting properly there is shalom between them and there is shalom between them and HaShem. That represents perfection. If there are no arguments among the Jewish People, but there is friction and tension and division between the Jewish People and the Almighty, that is not shalom.

Without unity and harmony between the Jews and the Master of the World, there is no shalom. Therefore, things can be patched over and everyone can "make nice and feel good," but if there is a division and gap between the nation and their God, this is not shalom.

At the end of last week's parshah, a tremendous gap developed between Israel and God. The Almighty was not happy. There was no shalom.

A man named Zimri had performed an immoral act before the entire assembly of the Children of Israel. If Pinchas had approached Zimri and said, "Zimri, you know you really shouldn't be doing that, maybe you should think it over…" nothing would have been accomplished. Zimri would not have listened and the error would have been compounded. That would not have restored the nation's harmony with the Almighty. In order to restore such harmony in this case, it was necessary to go ahead and make a stand! In this case, words were not enough – an action was required!

This is very radical. It teaches us that sometimes divisiveness is the only way to make peace. No one wants divisiveness between Jews. We all seek unity, mutual respect and care.

However, on occasion, on very, very rare occasion, one must make a stand for what is correct. One must be open-minded, one must be compromising, one must be understanding; yet, sometimes, sadly, one must make a stand and say, "No, this is too far, this is not right." Such zeal can only be used gingerly, with kid gloves, by people whose sole desire is to have unity, to be at one with all Jews and with the Almighty.

Can we continue to give in when faced with giving back Jerusalem? Can we give in when faced with redefining who is a Jew? Can we give in when the actual framework of Judaism and Jewish life is attacked? If we do, we will have nothing left. So, sadly, with tears in our eyes, with prayers for a better day, with hopes for true unity, we are forced to make a stand. A stand that says no, we cannot do it, we cannot act that way, we cannot agree. Then we can expect a true "covenant of peace" between all Jews; each other and God.

Keep your lawn kosher

IDEAS ON IDENTITY

By Rabbi Elyse Goldstein

I grew up in a family where a front-page scandal would send my mother immediately scanning for Jewish names.

"A shande!" she would cry. "One bad apple spoils the whole bunch."

But what I remember most about my mother's reaction was her fear for Judaism itself. "People will think that Judaism says it's all right to cheat," she'd say. She didn't care much about the person's bad name. It was the Torah's good name that was brought low, and that was the biggest shame.

Years later, I heard Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach z"l speak about this. He had a surprising angle on the Pirkei Avot verse, "Do not make the Torah a spade to dig with."

He looked out at the crowd and said, "I speak now to all the religious men. Yes, you who 'look the part.' When you fly for 11 hours to Israel and don't once take the baby, don't once play with the toddler, don't once give your wife a rest, but make sure to go and daven every minute you are needed for a minyan, you are making the Torah a spade to dig with. How? Because every non-religious Jew on the plane looks at you and says, 'Oh, that's how the Torah must say you should treat your wife. That's how all observant Jews must be – insensitive. That's what Judaism must allow.' By your actions, you have given all those onlookers a spade made of Torah to dig Judaism into the ground even further."

I'm thinking of this idea of using the Torah and Judaism's good name as a spade to dig with very literally this summer, as I tend my flowers with the help of a non-Jewish gardener. He works mostly with Jewish families. One of those families moved from one home to another without paying him his wages for over six months. Moved away with no forwarding address. Never left instructions to anyone else for paying this decent, hard-working man, a man trying to feed his own family and earn a fair day's wages.

What shall I tell this gardener when he asks me, "Is this how Jews are allowed to treat non-Jews? Perhaps it is because I am not one of you. Is this allowed in your religion?"

What shall I tell him when he cries to me that he needs this money very badly, that he did the work he was asked to do, cheerfully and skillfully, and that he waited and waited for the pay that was promised but never came?

Shall I teach him that the Torah in Vayikra forbids his wages to be held? That about him Devarim says, "Let him not cry out to God against you – it would be a sin upon you." Or that the Talmud in Bava Metsia 112 sees withholding a worker's wages as equivalent to taking his life? Shall I tell him that the mitzvah of paying a worker on time is no less important than building a Sukkah, that ethical conduct is no less demanded of us than counting the Omer?

Instead, I pay him on time myself and hope that will heal his pain and help him know that to be a Jew is to be a mensch. It is now summer, and Jewish families in suburbia will enjoy their lovely lawns and landscaped gardens, many of them taken care of by gardeners such as this man. In my opinion, the very grass their kids play on is "treif" unless the person who cuts it is paid properly, on time, and with fair wages.

Jewish Life

Extra work for no pay

Money Matters

By Rabbi Jay Kelman CA

The obligation to pay a worker on time is so central to Jewish ethics that failure to do is a violation of five biblical commandments (eating pork, in contrast, violates just one). While in today's environment, with paper trails and backups, disputes over whether a worker was actually paid are almost unheard of, such was not the case during talmudic times.

In recognition of the fact that employers are less inclined to remember the details of each and every employee, whereas the worker surely will know if he was paid, in a dispute over unpaid wages it is the employee who is given the opportunity to take an oath of non-payment enabling him to then receive his wages. This is a reversal of normal judicial jurisprudence that states that it is the defendant, that is, the employer, who would normally take an oath in order to absolve himself of any monies owing.

However, an employee claiming back wages is quite limited in his time for a claim. If he tarries, he forfeits the right to swear an oath that he was not paid. In general, when it comes to monetary law, Judaism has a very short statute of limitations. To do otherwise would be to create economic uncertainty – the enemy of a smoothly running marketplace – with parties never sure their transactions are fully binding. Thus if one is overcharged for an object, the Talmud expects that one would enter a claim that very same day. And if none is entered, one forever loses the legal right to compensation despite the moral wrong perpetrated against them.

Interestingly, when it comes to criminal activity or even ritual law, Judaism recognizes no statute of limitations – the need for atonement never lapses. Thus if one has stolen money from another, that debt is never forgiven or forgotten until repaid. In fact, Jewish law even discusses under which situations an heir is obligated to repay monies owed by parents.

CIBC is currently facing a lawsuit, potentially totalling 600 million dollars, alleging the bank does not pay its tellers and some other front-line workers for overtime. Such a suit would seem to have little merit in a Jewish court. In bringing forth the claims for back wages, a CIBC teller claims she has for the last nine years been forced to work overtime of between two and five hours a week, work for which she was not paid above her regular wages.

Even if we were to assume that her claim was to be accepted at face value and the extra work demanded of her was improper, the time has long past to make such a claim. By continuing her overtime for close to 10 years, she forfeits her rights to lodge a complaint. The time to speak up is immediately when a wrong is perpetrated.

Furthermore, it is far from certain her claim – even accepting her version of events – has much validity even if filed on time. Unpaid overtime is part and parcel of today's working environment. While from a secular legal perspective this is only true for professionals and management and not for nonmanagement employees such as a bank teller, Jewish law accepts the binding nature of local custom. Actual practice overrides "official" titles. If it is common place and part of the workplace culture for employees to have to work extra, such work becomes part of the regular job.

While an employer may not mislead a potential employee regarding any work conditions, the employee, too, bears some responsibility to investigate the "unwritten" rules of the workplace. Of course, as citizens of Canada, it is Canadian law and not Jewish law that is to be followed in monetary law.

*Operating Cash Flow is an additional but lesser known tool to assist retail investors in identifying stock values. In my experience, using Operating Cash Flow to value stock has been shown to assist, confirm, or challenge the value of stocks held by prospective clients. By experience, the use of OCF (Operating Cash flow multiples) may highlight certain shortcomings in using Earnings per Share, EBITDA and P/E ratios to value public stocks.

Resources for the blind, Pt. 1

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Although the Internet is primarily a visual medium, it still is an incredible resource for people who are blind or have limited vision. This week and next, Jewish resources for the blind.

The Jewish Highway

There are more Jewish sites devoted to deaf than to blind people. Perhaps that is related to the fact that sites for the blind need to conform to certain standards [http://tinyurl.com/qs4lf] if special "assistive software" (such as screen readers) is going to be used. Regardless, it should not be forgotten that there are numerous sites that provide Jewish music and audio classes that can be of great benefit to people who are blind or have limited sight. (More on that later.)

Jewish tradition holds that people who are blind are not required to do certain mitzvot and are not permitted to perform some others. Rabbi Moshe Tendler and Fred Rosner provide some examples.

- A blind person must light Sabbath candles on Friday night, as long as there is no danger to the person or to anyone else.
- A blind person may be accompanied by his guide dog into the synagogue. Since the dog is enabling its master to fulfil the commandment of public praying, it is not a desecration of the synagogue.
- A blind person may not perform the search for chametz prior to Passover; another member of the family should do so. [http://tinyurl.com/2v2sh2]

Rabbi Daniel Nevins serves as a member of the committee of the Conservative movement's committee of Jewish law and standards. Several years ago, they looked at to what extent blind people could be involved in Torah reading. They concluded that "Jews who are blind should participate in synagogue rituals together with sighted Jews, all of whom are obligated to keep the Torah." But because the Torah must be read for the congregation directly from a Torah scroll, and not from a printed text or from memory, Jews who are blind may participate in Torah reading in one of three ways:

- By receiving an aliyah and chanting softly after the reader;
- By serving as meturgamon, the verse-by-verse translator of a section of the parshah; or
- By reading from braille a standard Maftir, since it has already been chanted in the established fashion from the sefer Torah. [http://tinyurl.com/2hor4x]

The largest lender of Jewish books in braille and large print is JBI International. The New York-based organization was established in 1931 as the Jewish Braille Institute. According to its website, JBI lends its materials (including talking books) to more than 35,000 people around the world. Registered users can search the online database for material. JBI's braille library contains more than 8,500 titles in English and Hebrew. [www.jewishbraille.org/]

Braille is a system of writing in which a combination of six dots are raised in order to represent letters of the alphabet and are identified by touch. You can get a good visual representation on the Wikipedia page to compare how the English [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Braille] and Hebrew [http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Hebrew_Braille] alphabets are formed. It is interesting to note that the bet is the same as the "b" in English and the gimel is written like a "g," while a chet is written like an "x." I was surprised to learn that the letters in Hebrew braille are written from left to right.

Although they may not have been created specifically for people who are blind or visually impaired, there are many sites that provide audio entertainment, information and educational opportunities. For Jewish learning, check out the audio links at Jacob Richman's Hot Sites. [http://tinyurl.com/37hj4o] You can have any portion of the Torah chanted to you at the magnificent Navigating the Bible site. [http://tinyurl.com/2s5pdy]

For news and entertainment, go to the radio, podcast and music sections of Larry Grossman's excellent Jewish Webcasting Guide. [www.jewishwebcasting.com] And for music, don't miss Arutz Sheva's Music Jukebox. [http://tinyurl.com/2pohfn]

Please note that these sites were not necessarily created for people using specialized software for the blind. Those users may need assistance from sighted individuals to navigate the sites.

Israeli environmental group fights to clean up water resources

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Yariv Abramovich calls it the "new Zionism."

Abramovich, the executive director of one of Israel's leading environmental organizations, exults that Israelis are finally primed to preserve their natural patrimony.

In an interview in Toronto last week to promote the Association for Environmental Protection, or Zalul, he said, "The older generation gave us a country. Now it's time for the new generation to preserve it. We want a good, healthy country to live in. This is the new Zionism."

Founded eight years ago by a group of citizens concerned about the deterioration of Israel's water resources, Zalul carries out its mission through conservation, activism, research, awareness-raising and education.

Abramovich, a lawyer by training, said that Israelis are far more conscious of the environment than only a decade ago.

"They now understand that it is a problem you can't avoid. You won't drink the water? You won't breathe in the air? You won't sit on a beach?"

Adopting a combative tone, he charged that the Israeli government has neither passed strict legislation to protect the nation's waters nor aggressively enforced existing legislation.

In its annual report, Zalul states, "It has emerged, alarmingly, that most sea and river pollution in Israel in recent years has occurred with the knowledge and authorization of the Ministry of Environmental Protection..."

Data gathered by Zalul indicates that the ministry and an inter-ministerial permit committee issue more than 100 permits each year for discharging waste water into the Mediterranean Sea, sometimes disturbingly close to bathing beaches.

Zalul also found that there is no effective mechanism for overseeing the committee's activities so as to bring about a reduction in the number of permits granted for discharges into the sea, and that this deficiency enables polluters to continue their practices under the protection of the law.

Citing the report, Abramovich said that thousands of tons of hazardous substances and heavy metals and tens of millions of cubic metres of partially treated sewage and petroleum products are dumped into the sea, even though advanced technologies are available to treat waste water.

Yariv Abramovich

The biggest polluters, the chemical factories in and around Haifa, have poisoned the Kishon River and tarnished the quality of the Mediterranean Sea from Ashkelon in the south to Nahariya in the north.

Abramovich said that hundreds of Israeli naval commandos who trained in the Kishon have developed cancer. "There is definitely a connection between the environment and a person's state of health," he said. "It's not a fairy tale but a proven fact."

Abramovich said that Israel's 16 rivers, from the Jordan to the Yarkon, have all but degenerated into "sewage canals" since Israeli statehood.

"For the past 60 years, we have rushed into development. We ran like crazy to build a modern country, and we had to. But in doing so, we strangled our rivers and neglected the environment."

Turning to the Sea of Galilee, he pronounced it in good shape due to its importance as Israel's main source of drinking water.

But he wrung his hands over the possible fate of the Dead Sea, the world's lowest-lying body of water. Last month, in an unprecedented decision, the government granted the fertilizer industry permission to dump waste into the Dead Sea. "Nobody knows what the impact will be. The government is playing in a casino of pollution."

Zalul, made up of professionals from environmental science, law, academia and public relations, has launched a series of campaigns to raise public awareness and roll back government decisions deemed harmful to the environment.

One of its major initiatives is to preserve the endangered coral reef in the Gulf of Eilat.

"The reefs in Eilat are among the most spectacular anywhere. Scientists noticed that nearly 70 per cent of the reef had already died, the result of human pollution. Fish farms were killing the coral. We launched a campaign for the removal of fish cages from the Red Sea by 2008, and the government accepted our recommendations. We believe that the coral reef will regenerate itself in a few good years."

In further initiatives, Zalul is working to rehabilitate the Kishon, Lachish and Naaman rivers.

Zalul also convinced management at Tel Aviv's water treatment plant to stop releasing five million cubic metres of sludge into the sea and persuaded the adjacent municipality of Herzliya to build a new and better sewage treatment facility.

It is still trying to talk the government into allocating more funds for the Ministry of Environmental Protection. "What it gets is a drop in the ocean, compared to its needs."

Abramovich said that Zalul is financed by a combination of funds donated by individuals and foundations. "But we're also looking for international support," he said.

He described himself as a "professional environmentalist" rather than a "tree hugger."

"Our forte is our expertise," he said in a reference to Zalul. "We're mainstream, not hippies. We can't be dismissed. We're Israel."

Lawsuit 'the right thing to do'

Khalid Khokar, a representative of the MFC who is also the principal of the Islamic School of Cambridge, Ont., said he's seen the effects of the government's funding disparity first hand.

"My own school has had to deny admission to some of these disabled children… because we did not have the funds to accommodate their special needs," he said.

Allan Kaufman, a lawyer for the MFC, was confounded by the government's explanation for the funding exclusions.

"But it's the same government," he argued.

Kaufman said the MFC also recently discovered that the government has only spent $4.5 million of the $14.4 million allotment in each of the last two fiscal years.

Spencer confirmed those figures.

"The running average of the last two years [of funds spent] was about $4.5 to $5 million – that's what typically gets drawn upon every year," he said.

"This is a program that is application-based… it just so happens that the number of applications [has equalled] about $4.5 million in expenditures every year."

Spencer said the unspent money is "re-allocated to other programs that require it."

Kaufman said the spurious split in funding criteria for children with disabilities between the ministries of Health and Education means the unspent money could be allocated to private religious school students with disabilities.

He added that many parents have been forced to take their disabled children out of faith-based schools and enrol them in the public system in order to qualify for Ministry of Education funds.

Shell, representing the eight families, said the full $14.4 million would be "more than enough" to support all children with disabilities in private schools.

The case is scheduled to be heard in court Dec. 6.

86-year-old radio pro launches new show

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Geri Migicovsky, creator of the new seniors show, A Trip Down Radio Lane.

[Abigail Bimman photo]

Geri Migicovsky played the title role on Canada's first national radio soap opera in 1939, The Lives and Loves of Dr. Susan, when she was 18 years old.

Her radio and television career in Toronto and Ottawa lasted more than half a century and included everything from work with Wayne and Shuster and The Happy Gang to broadcasting with Peter Jennings to private lessons with Lorne Greene.

Now, Migicovsky is launching a new career to share her early days in Canadian radio with other seniors.

After moving to Thornhill, Ont., from Ottawa in October to be closer to her two children, Migicovsky found herself with time on her hands. She teamed up with Margot Glatt, who runs and performs in the interactive live show for seniors, Fit As A Fiddle Canada (416-823-8577).

Glatt and Migicovsky designed a new show, A Trip Down Radio Lane, to revisit radio's exciting times.

"We go to senior homes, and that's where our great audience is, because they are people that remember these things," Migicovsky said. "You should see their faces. It's just heartwarming."

The show is 55 minutes long and features Migicovsky sharing memories and stories from her radio career, interspersed with original clips, songs and commercials recorded on cassette tapes. Mounted pictures of the original radio greats serve as a backdrop to Migicovsky's narrative and musical journey.

> The program is compiled from Migicovsky's own memorabilia

Migicovsky gave The CJN a sample reading from the beginning of her script: "In the '20s and '30s life was simple, except in our imagination. Then the wonderful new medium called radio came along and opened up a great big window in our lives.

"Radio was the great equalizer. We were now connected to the outside world in a whole new way."

The 86-year-old's voice comes through clear and strong, drawing in the listener. Exactly what you would expect from a veteran of imageless, speech-based art.

"And you know –" Migicovsky broke away from the script. "As I read these, they become very real in my mind. I remember so distinctly."

The show is compiled from Migicovsky's own memorabilia, a trunk full of scripts, letters, notes, photos and tapes that she saved through the years.

"It brings all their memories [back to the seniors]," Migicovsky said. "Many of them don't sit and think about these things, but as soon as they hear the songs about The Happy Gang [it all comes back]."

Migicovsky broadcast on CJOH-TV for 17 years. She and Peter Jennings were the station's first co-anchors in 1961. Beyond the arts, her contributions to the Ottawa community, Jewish and non-Jewish, were immense over the 50 years she lived in the city with her late husband, director general of research for Agriculture Canada, PhD biochemist Bert Migicovsky.

Geri served as co-chair of Action 911 with Mark Maloney, and they were responsible for bringing 911 service to Ottawa in 1988.

"Ottawa was now a big city," Migicovsky said of the implementation of 911.

She also served on the board of many organizations, including the Ottawa Hospital, and was active in the Agudath Israel Congregation, where she served as president of the sisterhood. She was vice-president of the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation, which has since named a scholarship after her under the Pinchas Zuckerman Music Education Fund.

"The city has grown up in the last 50 years; Geraldine Migicovsky was never far from the noisy parade of progress," wrote the Ottawa Citizen's Kelly Egan in a tribute to her when she moved. "She made us better; as a city, she leaves us indebted."

"I'm making the most of it," Migicovsky said of her new life in Thornhill, close to her children but far from her friends and old routine. "I'm making a career for myself."

Mother's food recreated at book launch

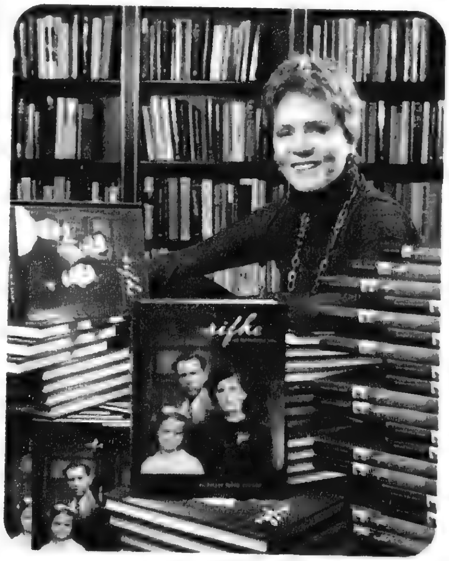
"Rifke" cooks all things Jewish

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Rosalie Wise Sharp wrote her memoir, Rifke, An Improbable Life, as a salute to the vanished shtetls of Poland.

As the last in line of her generation, Sharp, 71, wife of Isadore Sharp, founder and CEO of Four Seasons Hotels and Resorts, says she wanted to leave a story for her grandchildren and her future great-grandchildren.

The daughter of Ydessa and Joseph Wise who emigrated from Poland in 1930, Sharp grew up in a "shtetl" in North Toronto – her parents ran Wise's dry goods store on Yonge Street – surrounded by non-Jewish families.



Rosalie Sharp

"Our language was Yiddish. We ate the same food as my parents ate in Poland – including unmentionable parts of birds and animals such as cow's spleen, tongue, lung and liver – and our life was defined by the Holocaust. We never for a minute forgot we were Jewish."

Travel and sports were narishkeit (nonsense), she said, and "I didn't even mention an exchange program I was anxious to go on because I knew there was no hope."

The summer that two of her closest friends travelled to Europe, she went to work at her cousin's embroidery factory on Adelaide Street. As a third cousin, he was the family's closest living relative.

Despite her love of reading and learning, she was not encouraged to go to university, Wise says. It was her husband, whom she met at age 16, however, who eventually encouraged her to follow her dream of becoming an interior designer.

In her candid memoir, she talks about getting pregnant with Issy's baby before they married and her subsequent abortion, the birth of four sons – only one was planned, the others "materialized despite precautions" – and about the death of one of their four sons at age 17 of misdiagnosed melanoma.

She also talks about her tapeworm that she later learned came because her mother chopped raw fish to make gefilte fish, and then used the same board for other food.

Sharp recalls their weekly trip to Kensington Market to stock up "on all things Jewish," such as kosher meat and poultry, rye bread, cottage cheese, smoked meat and herring.

At the recent book launch of Rifke, held at the Four Seasons, Robert Bartley, executive chef of the hotel, recreated a number of recipes from Sharp's mother.

"[Rosalie] gave me the recipes, and we tweaked them and modified them until they were ready to serve. The stuffed miltz (recipe below) was unique to me. I turned to the Internet for guidance, where I learned to stuff it with farina."

Stuffed miltz

STUFFED MILTZ

Miltz is spleen. It is usually cooked and served pot roast style, stuffed.

1 miltz (cleaned)
2 cups farina (a cereal grain)
1 large onion (rough chopped)
3 large potatoes (peeled, washed, large-diced)
¼ cup schmaltz (rendered chicken fat) water salt
pepper

Very carefully slit skin covering miltz meat. Insert knife as far as possible to make a pocket. Fill pocket with plain, uncooked farina. In a saute pan over medium-high heat, saute the onions in the schmaltz until golden brown. Season miltz with salt and pepper, then add to pan and sear on all sides. Add potatoes and enough water to cover and simmer for about 1½ to 2 hours, or until soft.

Cut into slices and serve with gravy. Makes approximately 4 servings.

POTATONIK

1 tbsp. vegetable oil
6 medium baking potatoes
3 eggs
1 medium onion grated
2 tbsp. potato starch
1 tsp. kosher salt
white pepper to taste
¼ cup schmaltz (rendered chicken fat)

Pre-heat oven to 425. Grease an oven-proof dish with the vegetable oil. Peel and quarter the potatoes – store in cold water. Whisk eggs in a large mixing bowl and grate potatoes coarsely into the eggs. Add the potato starch and grated onion and season with salt and white pepper.

Heat schmaltz to boiling and quickly pour over mixture and mix well. Arrange in oven-proof dish and smooth the top slightly. Bake in the oven for approximately 1 hour or until mixture is brown and crispy.

Cut into squares about 2-inch thick and serve warm.

VEAL PATTIES

5 lb. lean ground veal
2 cups fresh challah (crumbled and moistened with a little water)
1 cup minced shallots
4 tbsp. fresh minced garlic
2 tbsp. fresh thyme, finely chopped
1 tbsp. fresh sage, finely chopped
6 oranges, finely zested
2 cups of port, (reduced down to a syrup)
salt and fresh white pepper to taste

Sweat the shallots and garlic in a little olive oil until the onions are translucent. Remove from heat and cool before mixing with meat. In a mixing bowl combine the ground veal, challah, softened shallots and garlic, thyme, orange zest, sage and port syrup; season with salt and pepper.

Thoroughly mix this mixture, form into 1-oz. balls and flatten them. Brown both sides on a griddle and cook to desired doneness.

Daniel Goldgut, an AEPi brother and a birthright israel participant, shakes hands with a Magen David Adom representative after presenting him with a cheque for $1,500 on behalf of the fraternity.

Birthright participants raise $1,500 for Magen David Adom

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Over the years, thousands of Canadians have toured Israel from coast to coast on Canada-Israel Experience (CIE) birthright trips, but few are given the opportunity to experience the joy of giving back to the Israeli community.

Members of the University of Western Ontario chapter of AEPi, a Jewish campus fraternity, had that experience. Fraternity members raised $1,500 for Magen David Adom and presented the cheque to MDA on their recent birthright trip.

Last month, CIE teamed up with AEPi to include a component in the fraternity's itinerary that would allow participants to visit the MDA centre in Tel Aviv to present a donation to MDA, and to visit the Canada Centre in Metullah, to donate nine pairs of ice skates.

"It was their [AEPi's] initiative. They wanted to do it. This is not usual for birthright," said Debbie Osiel, one of the trip leaders.

"They do a lot of tikkun olam projects back home. It's not like they just party and drink."

She said the money was raised from AEPi members in London, Ont., in advance of the trip and fraternity members collected money from trip participants as well.

"We took a tour of the Magen David Adom Center, met some staff, were addressed by the head of the educational department, got to learn about the way their dispatching system works and even got to take a peek at the ambulances," Osiel said.

At the Canada Centre, the 40-person group, which consisted mostly of AEPi members and alumni from UWO, went for a skate on the centre's hockey rink and took part in a ceremony during which nine pairs of hockey skates were presented to the centre and an Israeli hockey team.

"At the hockey centre, we made a presentation for them. We had the entire hockey team and the coach come… They were Israeli kids that were playing hockey in Israel, and I think some of the skates go to them and some were used as rentals for people who come to the Canada Centre," said Eric Silverberg, an AEPi member and a UWO business student.

He said that he and his fraternity brother, Daniel Goldgut, helped plan the charitable aspects of the tour.

Silverberg noted that there was a similar AEPi trip that went to the Canada Centre and the Magen David Adom Center three years ago, and this began a tradition for AEPi.

"We thought it would be something cool that we could do, and it is pretty unique to be able to go to Canada Centre and skate there when you're in Israel," he said.

Silverberg said that AEPi at Western has been involved with MDA in the past and he and his brothers wanted to continue to help in any way they could.

"We've done a lot of Magen David Adom work, and we felt it was fitting to do something for them, too," he said.

"Going on the trip was important, first of all, but being able to give back is something we thought was really important."

JACOB SAMUEL KOTLER ז"ל

Beloved son of Robert and Richelle Kotler of Calgary, peacefully passed away, on Monday, June 25, 2007 at the age of 8 years. Jacob loved to sing, dance and play and he was known as the "entertainer". He had a genuine loving heart that he shared openly with everyone. Jacob will be forever remembered by his parents Robert and Richelle; grandparents; aunts and uncles and by many cousins. Funeral Services at the Jewish Memorial Chapel, Calgary, on Wednesday, June 27, 2007, followed by a graveside service at the 37th Street Cemetery. In lieu of flowers, donations may be made directly to the Jacob Samuel Kotler Memorial Fund, c/o The Benjamin Foundation, 3429 Bathurst St., Toronto, M6A 2C3 416-780-0324.

The friends of our dear Mania Kroll regret her passing on June 22, 2007. We remember Mania's generosity, loyalty and love. We send our condolences to her sons Gidi and Ofer, and to her grandchildren Jade Michal and Julian.

SEX WILL GET BETTER WHEN WE BECOME ROMANTICS AGAIN: RABBI SHMULEY

By KYLE GORDON
Special to The CJN

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach, prominent author and TV host, addressed a small gathering of young adults about heterosexual relationships and modern culture's corruption of romance late last month.

"Sex is the intense motion that brings forth the intense emotion. It is the only activity reserved for humanity that has in its power the capacity to sew together man and woman as bone of one bone and flesh of one flesh," said the bestselling author of Kosher Sex.

Modern pop culture does not view sex in this capacity as Rabbi Boteach went on to illustrate, by examining the evolution of romantic relationships and their popular descriptions.

During the Victorian era, men and women would court each other. A man would refine his character to become a gentleman and worthy of a woman, Rabbi Boteach said on June 20 at The House, a second-storey venue in Toronto that offers programming and a place to hang out for young Jews from all backgrounds.

"There was a beauty in the word 'court.' It had a spatial connotation related to creating a home," said Rabbi Boteach, who hosts The Learning Channel's Shalom in the Home, during which he helps dysfunctional families overcome their problems.

The spatial nuance slowly developed into a temporal one with words such as "she's my date" or "we're going out." By 2007, the term courting had been replaced with "hooking up" – a phrase adopted on university campuses across North America.

"It connotes the relationship between a [moving truck] and a station wagon," Rabbi Boteach said.

"It is a symbol of how much we have degraded ourselves, our bodies and our capacity for intimacy."

But the degradation of the human body, especially the female form, is not unique to North America. While in Dakar, Senegal, Rabbi Boteach was shocked by the self-hatred prominent in one of the world's poorest countries.

"There were massive billboards advertising skin bleaching for women. You don't even hate your poverty, you hate the colour of your skin," he said.

So, where does this kind of self-hatred come from? Perhaps it is due to the abundance of pornography, bikini-clad women and premarital sex that has enabled men to become experts in a woman's body, Rabbi Boteach said.

"Every man that comes to a woman is a supreme court justice highly experienced," he said.

Women are prepared to undergo breast augmentation surgery and botox injections because they feel that they are somehow inadequate, he added.

"The essence of being a woman today is that everything about you isn't good enough. Your hair isn't blond enough, your eyes never blue enough and your weight never thin enough," said Rabbi Boteach.

This feeling of inadequacy has also made its way into the bedroom. According to Rabbi Boteach, 80 per cent of women admit to faking an orgasm.

Sex should be one of life's most pleasurable moments. It should be a time to embrace and accept who you are and release all your inhibitions, he said.

"Yet there, in the most intimate activity, you are faking it. That completely destroys sex. That means that we have not left a single bastion of innocence where we can just be. Isn't that why we are so insecure today, why we are so inadequate?" he said.

During the discussion period a woman challenged Rabbi Boteach's premise that the "hook-up generation," or men's expertise in women's bodies, are the cause of female inadequacy.

"There is a whole corporate marketing culture that is teaching men how to be men and women how to be women for the sole purpose of selling. The hook-up culture is a byproduct of commercialism, so that we see ourselves as disposable," said the female audience member.

"I agree. It all comes from a very masculine aggressive posture of the culture," Rabbi Boteach said.

"It has got to get better, and it will get better when we become romantics again," he added.

Rabbi Shmuley Boteach speaks to students at The House in Toronto about the way modern culture has trivialized sex. [Kyle Gordon photo]

New UIAFC head hopes to extend organization's reach

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Taking on the presidency of United Israel Appeal Federations Canada (UIAFC) would be a formidable task for anyone, but for Barbara Farber it's business as usual.

The Ottawa native has been involved in – and probably chaired – just about every organization in the local Jewish community over the past three decades.

President of the family business, Leikin Group Inc., Farber began her career immediately after graduating from York University in 1972.

"I had the privilege of working with my grandfather for 26 years, where I saw business conducted in a tough yet fair and always ethical way. And I am now fortunate to be working alongside my two brothers three generations later," she said.

She also learned from her grandfather, a founding member of Agudath Israel Synagogue, the importance of volunteering and participating fully in the community. Her father, Stan Katz, was also president of the synagogue and eventually Farber followed, becoming the first female president of the Conservative congregation.

She has served as president of the Jewish Community Council of Ottawa (now the Jewish Federation of Ottawa); chair of the building committee of Hillel Lodge; vice-chair of the National Board of Canada-Israel Committee; and held several positions with UIAFC prior to becoming president.

Farber does not confine her volunteerism to the Jewish community, however. "I like to be involved in the general community as well."

She is currently a member of the Ottawa International Airport Authority Board and immediate past chair (and first chair) of the Algonquin College Foundation Board.

In the past year, she was a committee member of the major gifts division of United Way Ottawa, a member of the Telus Ottawa Community Board and a federally appointed panel member of the NCC (National Capital Commission) Mandate Review.

She finds the time to be involved in volunteer activities while running a business, she said, because, she has very little downtime. "I start very early in the morning with a workout. I start replying to e-mails at 6:30 a.m., just after breakfast…I eat lunch sitting at my desk."

Barbara Farber

In addition to her time management skills, Farber credits the people around her for their support. "I have outstanding staff, both in Canada and in Israel. A volunteer is only as good as the staff behind her," she said.

"That goes for my business life as well. I have good staff, and my brothers and I are all very supportive of one another.

"I probably have the best husband in the world. [Len] has supported me in all of my activities since we have been married. My parents, Stan and Libby Katz, have always been supportive as well. Every Friday night, my mother made the Shabbat dinner…my children had a great upbringing, with my parents and grandparents being with us."

Being the first president of UIAFC from outside of Montreal or Toronto, Farber is anxious to extend the reach and influence of the organization from coast to coast. "There are many mid-sized federations, small-sized federations and some unfederated communities as well," she said, and she will try to get them all involved.

"I think it is very important for everyone to feel a part of it."

Another goal for Farber's two-year term is to involve youth and encourage future community leadership.

Klein's thesis on Israel is 'total rubbish'

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

Journalists and writers who contribute to the commentary pages of newspapers and magazines are, by definition, involved in advancing opinion, even strongly held views. Few do that more prominently than Naomi Klein. But when they push their polemics so far that they violate – even butcher – basic facts, they also violate a core tenet of journalistic responsibility: maintaining intellectual integrity.

In her June 21 commentary, "Israel thrives, Gaza suffers," for the B.C.-based alternative weekly, the Georgia Straight, Klein failed or refused to get even basic facts about Israel's economy straight. She asked how is it that while Israel is facing so many regional problems (Lebanon, Gaza, Syria/Golan Heights), and has a political leadership wracked by corruption charges, its economy is booming.

Her answer: "[L]arge parts of Israel's tech economy ha[ve] been repurposed… Israel [has gone] from inventing the networking tools of [New York Times columnist Thomas Friedman's] 'flat world' to selling fences to an apartheid planet."

Citing a bold statistic, that in 2006 "Israel exported $3.4 billion in defence products," Klein implied that Israel's "huge and expanding export business" is identified only with military exports, and, moreover, that "much of this [export] growth has been in the so-called homeland security sector."

In a telephone interview, Israel-based journalist and author Jim Lederman (who writes on Israeli and Palestinian political economy for the British consultancy Oxford Analytica), said that Klein's thesis, along with her extremely selective use of statistics, "is total rubbish. She takes accurate figures on Israel's arms sales and then weaves a tale of total fantasy. The idea that arms sales are the basis for the recent growth of the Israeli economy is simply false."

With a 2006 GDP of $195 billion (US), according to the International Monetary Fund, the $3.4 billion in military exports amounts to less than two per cent of Israel's economy – not insignificant, but very far from a full and fair explanation for Israel's economic growth, which has averaged five per cent per year over the past three years.

Lederman continued: "Israel's economy is booming, but certainly not mainly for the reasons Klein gives. A recent study by the Bank of Israel found that, over a period of two decades, two-thirds of Israeli growth has been due to immigrant absorption and Israel's participation in a growing world civilian economy. The smart money that is going into start-ups today is divided among companies specializing in telecommunications (30 per cent), life sciences (16 per cent), and the Internet (16 per cent).

"Another factor that cannot be underestimated is foreign investor confidence – the result of economic reforms, government fiscal discipline and economic growth outside of high tech, such as banking and real estate."

In fact, Lederman explained, according to a study on Israel's economy released in March by Tel Aviv University professor Manuel Trajtenberg, all of Israel's high-tech industries taken together – including the defence and security-related industries, in addition to major companies such Intel, Comverse, Amdocs, Teva, etc. – provide employment for only seven per cent of the Israeli workforce."

It seems that Klein is so ideologically driven to paint Israel as an aggressive military power and as a wanton oppressor of the Palestinians (she devotes a good part of her commentary to this), that she's only too willing to twist isolated statistics to service this aim.

Readers beware.

And editors should do minimal fact-checking – something in frightening decline almost everywhere these days – before publishing such erroneous diatribes.

El Al seeks new manager as Morais makes aliyah

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

As general manager of El Al's Canadian operations, Stanley Morais has seen many families make aliyah.

Once or twice a year, Nefesh b'Nefesh, an organization that helps olim get established in Israel, would book a block of seats and shepherd prospective immigrants on the first leg of their great Israeli adventure.

Always a little bit envious of the olim, Morais will be envious no more. On Aug. 12, Morais, his wife Janet and their three daughters will join a group of immigrants heading for Israel.

Morais, who has served as El Al's general manager for four years, will vacate his position at the end of next month. The airline has started looking for a replacement, and although he won't divulge any secrets, Morais said the shortlist includes at least one Canadian.

He was the first Canadian to head up the Israeli airline's domestic operations when he took over the top job in 2003. He joined El Al in 1993 as sales and marketing manager after stints with the Israel Government Tourist Office (IGTO) and a private marketing agency.

When he became general manager, the airline was experiencing a difficult patch, but he believes he leaves it on a sounder financial footing than when he started in the position.

Back in 2003, the airline, and Israel in general, had not yet fully recovered from the Palestinian intifadah. The constant violence dissuaded many travellers from booking trips to Israel, and those with reservations would often cancel when a high-profile bombing took place – even if their trip was six months down the road, he said.

In the last couple of years, things have really turned around.

"We have seen a tremendous growth for the the Canadian market," he said. Before, "we were taking money from the company instead of giving it."

Even though the IGTO has reported a 25 per cent drop in the number of Canadians visiting Israel, El Al's figures show slightly less than 30 per cent increase in traffic in the January to March 2007 period over the year before.

Stanley Morais

That anomalous situation could be due to a couple of factors, Morais said. The IGTO records the number of Canadians travelling to Israel, while El Al takes into account all passenger traffic, which includes people travelling on Israeli passports. In addition, Morais speculated, perhaps other carriers are experiencing reduced passenger loads.

Nevertheless, the Toronto route is no longer the financial drain on El Al that it was only a few years ago.

At the time, it had suffered a drop in passenger traffic and it was hampered by systemic costs that are not so easily reversed. El Al, he pointed out, has high security costs, high fuel costs, is affected by the exchange difference between the Canadian and U.S. dollars, and like other carriers, pays the world's highest landing fees to operate out of Toronto's Pearson International Airport.

While all that hasn't changed, other aspects of the airline's operations have. The Los Angeles leg of the route was dropped after the southern California city started filling planes on its own, negating the need to stop in Toronto en route to Israel.

And as of April 19, the airline no longer brings Chicago passengers to Toronto en route to Israel. For the spring and summer months, El Al will fly four non-stop flights to Israel each week, dropping that number to three in the fall and winter, he said.

Morais' handling of the difficult Toronto route must have impressed people at head office. Their co-operation in offering him a job in Israel was an important factor in the decision to make the move. When he arrives, he'll have a job waiting for him in the airline's commercial department, which handles sales and marketing.

The family will move to Ra'anana, a city of 80,000 northeast of Tel Aviv, near Herzliyah.

A graduate of Associated Hebrew Schools and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, Morais has always been attracted to Israel. He recalls fondly a trip his family took to the Jewish state when he was 16, as well as a year he spent studying at Hebrew University.

It was during that year that he and his future wife, Janet Rusonik, also of Toronto, "found our bashert."

Since their marriage in 1992, they have often talked about living in Israel. A few years ago, during the intifadah, they spent a month in Kadimah, having swapped houses with an Israeli family that wanted to live in Toronto. Two summer vacations in Israel followed, and eventually they made the decision to make the move.

Morais, who travels to Israel often, said whenever he arrived there, "I sighed and felt this is where I belong. I felt comfortable."

He and Janet also believe that living in Israel will be the best way to give their children a Jewish education.

"The kids are hesitatingly excited," he said. "They are hesitant about leaving their friends and family and going to school [where everything will be] in Hebrew. That will be a challenge to them, but they are coming from a good base."

Security concerns are not paramount

"We don't want to live our lives in fear," Morais said. "I'm more of a fatalist. Whatever happens will happen. I want to live my dream."

Echenbergs fund international genocide conference

Actress Mia Farrow, Nobel Prize-winning Nigerian author Wole Soyinka and retired Canadian general Romeo Dallaire are among the scheduled speakers at the inaugural Echenberg family conference on human rights, to be held at McGill University Oct. 11 to 13.

The Global Conference on the Prevention of Genocide will bring together survivors and witnesses of mass killings of Jews and Roma during World War II, as well as more recently in Cambodia, the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, and eminent scholars, politicians, journalists and activists from around the world.

Farrow is a UNICEF goodwill ambassador and activist against the current human tragedy in Darfur.

Among the other participants announced are Hedi Fried, Holocaust survivor and author of The Road to Auschwitz: Fragments of a Life, United Nations special adviser on genocide prevention Juan Mendez, and MP Irwin Cotler, a human-rights lawyer and former justice minister.

McGill law professor Payam Akhavan, a former UN war crimes prosecutor at The Hague, will chair the conference.

The aim is to "open a dialogue between decision-makers and genocide survivors, between the leaders of this generation and those of the next, with the goal of exploring means of preventing genocidal violence, rather than focussing on intervention after the fact," organizers said in a statement.

A pre-conference of 35 young human-rights activists will be held starting Oct. 7.

A number of public exhibitions of photographs, films, art, artifacts and multimedia providing personal accounts of crimes against humanity will be held in conjunction with the conference.

The Echenberg family human rights conference series was established in January through a donation from McGill graduate Gordon Echenberg and his wife Penny. While studying at the faculty of law, Echenberg (BA '61, BCL '64) served as president of the McGill Students Society. He is a founding director of Interamicus, a McGill-based international rights advocacy centre.

Klein, Wolofsky named 'national historic figures'

Poet and journalist A.M. Klein and Hirsch Wolofsky, founder of the Kanader Adler, Montreal's Yiddish-language newspaper, have been designated as national historic figures by the Canadian government.

Klein (1909-1972) will be remembered with the installation of a plaque at his former home on Hutchison Street in Outremont. Wolofsky's (1876-1949) contribution as a media pioneer will be acknowledged with a plaque on the former St. Laurent Boulevard offices of the Yiddish newspaper he published from 1907.

Klein and Wolofsky have been officially recognized largely through the efforts of Jeffrey Boro, immediate past president of Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec region, and the CJC Archives. The recognition is extended under Parks Canada's Ethnocultural Communities History Initiative.

"We are very pleased that the unique contributions made by these two Jewish individuals to Canadian society have been officially recognized by the government of Canada," said CJC Quebec-region president Victor Goldbloom. "The plaques to be erected in their honour help ensure that future generations of Canadians will learn about their accomplishments and the role that notable members of our community have played in Quebec and Canadian history."

Research aims to treat disease affecting soldiers serving in Mideast

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Two Israeli-trained infectious disease specialists working in Winnipeg have received funding through the Jewish National Fund of Canada (JNF) to study an infectious disease affecting Canadian soldiers serving in Afghanistan.

Leishmaniasis is a condition commonly found in certain parts of the Middle East, in particular Afghanistan and the Jordan Valley.

Ethan Rubinstein, head of infectious diseases at the University of Manitoba, said the protozoan is transmitted by the bite of a female sandfly.

The sandfly infects the host with the parasite, which then begins to eat away flesh. Untreated, leishmaniasis can leave visible scarring and, in extreme cases, permanent disfigurement.

Rubinstein, former head of internal medicine at Tel Aviv University's medical school, notes that the infection is not contagious and the lesions eventually heal on their own after a lengthy period. Treatments involve either topical compounds, applying heat to the infected area, or antimony-based solutions and anti-fungal agents administered systemically.

Israeli farmers and soldiers serving in the Israel Defence Forces are affected by the disease, Rubinstein said, and since 2001, more than 700 American military personnel returning from Iraq and Afghanistan have been diagnosed with a form of leishmaniasis. It has also been observed in Canadian soldiers.

"We are treating six cases from Camp Shilo [an army base in western Manitoba]," Rubinstein said, "but they are not responding to traditional treatments. We want to find out what kind of leishmaniasis we are dealing with. The tropical variety should be responding well to our treatment. Perhaps this is a Mediterranean strain, or something new."

The research project is a collaborative effort involving scientists from the University of Manitoba departments of medical microbiology, internal medicine and immunology, and McGill University, as well as Dr. Moshe Ephros from the Technion, Israeli Institute of Technology. The lead researchers are Rubinstein, and Dr. Yoav Keynan, formerly of the infectious disease unit at Carmel Hospital in Haifa, who has been working at the University of Manitoba for about 18 months.

The initial funding for the research has been provided by Winnipeg businessman Len Podheiser, a past president of the JNF for Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and former Winnipegger Nathan Jacobson, a philanthropist with business interests and residences in Israel, Ukraine and Canada.

Rubinstein said the researchers are looking to the government of Manitoba and the federal government to provide additional funding for the project, which he anticipates will take between six and nine months to complete.

Katsav pleads to lesser charge, avoids rape conviction

By DAN BARON
JTA

JERUSALEM — His reputation in shambles from a sex scandal that broke a year ago and swelled in subsequent months, Israel's outgoing president put an end to the sordid chapter by agreeing to a plea bargain after months of insisting he was innocent.

Under the deal announced last Thursday, President Moshe Katsav pleaded guilty to sexually harassing and molesting female staff in exchange for prosecutors' agreement not to pursue rape charges against him. He also resigned early – his resignation was to take effect Sunday – received a suspended prison sentence, and agreed to pay compensation to the complainants.

This marks the first time an Israeli head of state has been convicted of sexual misconduct, a legacy many hope soon will be forgotten after former prime minister Shimon Peres takes over the presidency July 15.

For much of this year, Katsav was on a leave of absence and Knesset Speaker Dalia Itzik served as acting president.

"Israel's 'No. 1 citizen' has become a convicted sexual offender," Attorney General Menachem Mazuz told reporters. "The shame will accompany him forever."

The deal was deplored by women's rights groups and others who saw the plea bargain as an easy pass for a member of Israel's political elite, the latest in a long string of lenient convictions and sentences for a corrupt Israeli leadership.

The attorney for the employee of the president's residence who had accused Katsav of rape, known as Complainant A, petitioned Israel's High Court of Justice last week in an effort to block the plea deal, but her request was denied.

"The attorney general gave in to pressure, and the prosecutor forfeited the doing of justice because we're talking about the president," attorney Kinneret Barashi told reporters. "This is a black day. At issue is a complainant who told her truth, in which she believes. Along with her, I will fight by all means in order to change this decision and bring justice to light. I have a great deal to say, and the last word has yet to be said."

Mazuz said the State Attorney's Office entered the plea bargain because it saw difficulties in proving the toughest allegations, some of them dating back years.

"A confession by the president is no trivial matter," Mazuz said, defending the agreement.

But Israel's Association of Rape Crisis Centers said in a statement in response, "The plea bargain sends a clear message to sexual assault victims: better to stay quiet, better not to tell. In the State of Israel, there is no one to safeguard the victims of sexual assault."

When Mazuz's office first said in January that it was considering a rape indictment, Katsav took a leave of absence, but angrily denied wrongdoing. In a raucous speech in which the president clearly lost his temper, Katsav spoke of himself as the victim of a "witch hunt" targeting successful members of Israel's Sephardi underclass.

Livni, Canadian envoy slam UNHRC

RAMAT GAN — Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni criticized the United Nations Human Rights Council last week for its decision to single out Israel for repeated criticism.

"There is no connection between the United Nations Human Rights Council and human rights," Livni said in a June 27 address to dignitaries and officials at Canada Day celebrations in Ramat Gan.

Tzipi Livni

The foreign minister thanked Canada for being the only one of the council's 47 members to vote against its decision last month to place Israel on its permanent agenda.

"It's easy to be a friend of Canada, and difficult to be a friend of Israel," she said, adding Israel needs allies who are willing to stand up for it.

"These are not diplomatic words, and I hope the diplomats here will take it as an example," Livni added.

Canada's ambassador to Israel, Jon Allen, told Ha'aretz that Canada had protested the council's announcement of a unanimous decision to keep Israel on the permanent agenda.

"Canada took a strong stance and voted no, and notwithstanding, the chairman went ahead and declared a consensus," Allen said.

"Israel should not be singled out when countries like Belarus and Sudan are ignored," the ambassador said, adding that Canada supports a two-state solution but believes in Israel's right to defend itself in a "tough neighbourhood."

Jon Allen

Public Security Minister Avi Dichter described Canada as a "real friend" of Israel.

He recalled his March meeting in Ottawa with Canadian Prime Minister Stephen Harper in which Harper vowed to maintain a tough stance on terrorism.

"I hope Canada will never face what we face in Israel," Dichter told guests at the celebrations, which were held at the Diamond Exchange.

"A network of evil can only be defeated by a network of democratic countries like Canada and Israel," he said.

The Human Rights Council, based in Geneva, was formed approximately a year ago as part of a reform initiated by then-UN secretary general Kofi Annan.

The UN voted to replace the Human Rights Commission with the council in an attempt to address both criticisms of the commission's composition, which frequently included some of the world's worst human rights abusers, and what Annan called its excessive focus on Israel.

Russian mogul wins European Jewish Congress election

By DINAH SPRITZER
JTA

BRUSSELS — The election this week of the first eastern European to the helm of the European Jewish Congress is fuelling speculation that the 20-year-old organization will expand its focus beyond issues relating to anti-Semitism, Israel and other Middle East flashpoints.

Moshe Kantor

Moshe Kantor, the president of the Russian Jewish Congress, scored a large victory in last week's vote that capped what had evolved into a bitter contest with the incumbent, Tunisian-born Frenchman Pierre Besnainou.

Kantor, 53, will lead the only pan-European Jewish organization devoted primarily to lobbying politicians and the European Union on behalf of Europe's 3.5 million Jews, often on Middle East-related issues and the need to combat anti-Semitism.

While Kantor does not plan for the European Jewish Congress (EJC) to abandon these issues, he has displayed a preference for engaging politicians behind the scenes and has dedicated more resources to promoting Jewish cultural and educational causes.

Kantor's activities and style stand in vivid contrast to those of Besnainou, who devoted his energies to attacking anti-Semitism and pushing EU leaders to be harsher on Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad.

Kantor, a billionaire philanthropist who has resided in Geneva for 14 years, has promised to expand the 41-country organization's activities into the field of education and culture, improve fundraising and lessen its financial dependence on the World Jewish Congress.

In the end, it seemed that although EJC members rarely miss a chance to express their solidarity with Israel, they wanted equal focus on their specific European problems.

"It is the job of Israeli ambassadors to speak on behalf of Israel to the European Union," said Kobi Benatoff of Italy, a past EJC president. "We need to support Israel, but we speak on behalf of European Jewry."

Kantor's election was slammed by Leonid Nevzlin, a Russian tycoon who moved to Israel to avoid what he describes as politically motivated criminal charges aimed at punishing him for opposing Russian President Vladimir Putin.

"It is regretful that Mr. Kantor was elected as the president of the EJC since there are substantial doubts as to his true intentions in this position," Nevzlin said in a statement.

The statement went on to say that an EJC president "with strong ties and a bias to the Kremlin, which increasingly has regressed to authoritarianism and shows a lack of respect to European democratic values, is unlikely to contribute to the development of European Jewry and its ties with Israel."

Throughout much of the campaign for the EJC presidency, opponents painted Kantor as a Putin loyalist. Besnainou claimed that Kantor's election would hurt Israel and European Jewry because he would be unwilling to harm his good relationship with the Kremlin. Kantor is among the wealthiest people in Russia with an estimated net worth of $1.7 billion.

One French delegate noted that Kantor was silent when Putin met with Hamas representatives in Moscow after the Islamist party's election victory last year and condemned Israel for using disproportionate force in last summer's Lebanon war.

But Kantor told JTA last week that "cooperation and not confrontation" are the best tools for influencing Kremlin policy.

"Putin came to Krakow for the World Holocaust Forum and apologized for the existence of anti-Semitism in Russia," he said, referring to an event that was part of Auschwitz liberation ceremonies. "We invited him to be there, and this is the concrete result of our efforts."

Kantor did not respond publicly to any of the attacks on him in the Israeli press by Besnainou or his supporters. Instead he promoted his funding of massive heritage projects, such as the $6 million Auschwitz commemoration in 2005 attended by 70 heads of state.

In last week's election, with the voting weighted per country, Kantor received 55 votes to 30 for Besnainou. There were two abstentions.

Some voters praised the image of integration between eastern and western Europe.

"We are way ahead of the European Union," said the president of the Swiss Federation for Jewish Communities, Alfred Donath, who has known Kantor for more than a decade. "Russia might actually join the EU in a decade, but now we Europeans have a Russian leader. And why not?"

Adam Dawson, who serves on the executive of the British Board of Jewish Deputies, Britain's Jewish umbrella organization, said, "I think Mr. Kantor's win is a good for European Jewry because he has a fresh vision."

An engineer and scientist who made his fortune with a fertilizer company he bought for little money from the Russian state in the early 1990s, Kantor is short on political lobbying experience. One of his campaign promises was to appoint a vice-president who will be responsible for EU relations.

In the end, several EJC delegates told JTA they supported Kantor because they liked his financial support for Jewish causes. Last year, he put up $10 million for the European Jewish Fund, which helps communities develop Jewish cultural and educational programs.

Kantor has promised to find new sources of revenue for the organization so it can also focus on education.

For Kantor, the threat of assimilation is just as serious as the threat of anti-Semitism.

'I am sure a change will come about' changing anything in the car," says Bronicki, who co-founded the company with Lucien in 1965.

Biodiesel can be plant or animal based, but it is usually made from soy or canola oil. It is a renewable energy source, which burns cleaner than regular diesel, is less toxic than table salt and will help curb dependence on foreign oil.

Its use will help to cut down greenhouse gases, the major contributor to global warming.

While use of biodiesel is increasing in the United States, the fuel currently in use has its limitations. Cars that run on diesel, especially older ones, often need to be retrofitted with a special device for the fuel to be processed properly. And in most cases, only a small proportion (between two and five per cent) of the biodiesel can be used in a traditional diesel mix.

'We are talking about having independence from Middle East oil'

And although Ormat expects its biodiesel to be more expensive than traditional diesel in the beginning, Bronicki believes there will be government and state incentives in the United States for promoting its use.

Bronicki and her husband started Ormat in 1965. "We were never hippies, though," she says. "We were always square people with a clear vision that we wanted to do something in which Israel could excel."

Today, Ormat has realized its vision. It is one of the most important alternative and renewable energy companies in the world, especially in the areas of geothermal energy and energy recovery.

Ormat has a stake in a multi-billion dollar project with OPTICanada to refine heavy oil spread throughout the Alberta tar sands in Canada. Ormat owns the technology that the Canadian company will be using.

"People need fuel security and fuel diversity," Bronicki says. "We are talking about having independence from Middle East oil in countries like Canada and the U.S. What we are doing is an important step in making that happen."

Ormat, which has about 700 employees, derives most of its income from working in the area of geothermal energy (taking heat energy from the earth and converting it into usable energy). The company has commercialized a technology called the organic rankine cycle (ORC).

ORC enables production of electricity not only from steam but also from hot water. Ormat has 11 such energy plants around the world, with several in Nevada and California. Ormat has also built similar units in a Kenyan wildlife reserve.

"Geothermal power usually follows consumption needs, and because of that we generally build our plants in populated areas," says Bronicki, whose plants produce about 360 megawatts of power – enough energy for about 500,000 people.

Energy recovery is the company's second most important area of business. Ormat has built a turbine technology that fits heat-generating factories.

"These turbines collect heat that would otherwise be wasted," says Bronicki, who notes that the heat from cement kilns and other industrial processes salvaged by the Ormat units equates to about 50,000 pounds worth of fossil fuel saved each day.

She adds, "Most of our applications are along natural gas pipelines, which use waste heat collected from gas turbines that drive the compressors." Ormat's energy clients include Basin Electric in North Dakota, Southern California Edison and Sierra Pacific Power in Nevada.

The energy collected either goes back to serve the customer's needs or is sold to utility companies for general use.

Bronicki recognizes her company's importance, but she believes it will take more than one company's good intentions and deeds to reverse environmental pollution and global warming.

"Ormat is only one drop in the bucket," she says. "And that bucket should be a co-operative effort of policy makers, and people who influence public opinions in the U.S. and around the world."

Bronicki, however, is positive about the future.

"Public opinion is evolving all the time," she says. "I am sure a change will come about using biodiesel, ethanol, geothermal, recovered and other alternative and renewable energy sources. Awareness is more important in the U.S. than any lobby group."

Canada applies to join Holocaust task force

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

In a departure from longstanding Canadian policy, the Harper government has applied to join a respected international organization that promotes Holocaust education.

Jason Kenney, secretary of state for multiculturalism and Canadian identity, was in Prague recently to request observer membership in the Task Force for International Co-operation on Holocaust Education, Remembrance and Research.

The task force is a 24-member organization of European nations, plus the United States, that was formed in 1998 by then-Swedish prime minister Goran Persson. Its purpose is to promote Holocaust education, remembrance and research and to support the Stockholm Declaration, which affirmed "the unprecedented character of the Holocaust" and the need of the international community to oppose genocide, ethnic cleansing, racism, anti-Semitism and xenophobia.

In his address to the conference, Kenney said Canada was committed to moving from observer status toward full membership in the task force.

"As a member of the task force, Canada would seek to develop further means to educate the public about the Holocaust, to commemorate that horrific event and to do all it can to ensure that that dark period in history is never repeated."

Noting the worldwide increase in anti-Semitic incidents – 31 per cent more in 2006 than the year before – Kenney said Canada has also experienced increased "vandalism and attacks motivated by race and religion… with the vast majority being anti-Semitic in nature.

"Membership in the task force allows Canadians to remember anti-Semitism of the past as well as to guard against the new anti-Semitism."

Quoting Prime Minister Stephen Harper's warning that hatred of Jews is still preached from religious pulpits and political podiums, he said "there are still people who would perpetrate another Holocaust if they could. That's why we must resist the error of viewing the Holocaust as a strictly historical event. It's not good enough for politicians to stand before you and say they remember and mourn what happened over six decades ago. They must stand up to those who advocate the destruction of Israel and its people today."

Bernie Farber, chief executive officer of Canadian Jewish Congress, was in Prague as part of the Canadian delegation to the task force meetings. He applauded Canada's efforts to join the task force, adding that Canada's absence in an organization that includes most western democracies "was noted."

"The fact we weren't there was something no one could really understand. It should have been a slam dunk."

The previous Liberal government had been asked to join, but it "had a different view of how the Holocaust should be presented – holistically as a terrible genocide, but not in any way that makes it different than other genocides," Farber said.

The task force, on the other hand, sees the Holocaust as a unique event in world history in which the intention was to wipe out an entire people. "That had never been done before," Farber said.

He added Canada's participation "should be viewed by our community as highly, highly significant. [It demonstrates] how issues of anti-Semitism are viewed by this government."

Bar mitzvah money builds playground in Kiryat Shmonah

By MINDY G. ALTER
Special to The CJN

Avid sports fan Norman Yallen knew he wanted to use his bar mitzvah money to fund a sports-related project in Israel, but at first he couldn't imagine what it might be.

Gust Voice

A few months before Norman was set to travel to Israel with family and friends to celebrate his bar mitzvah, Angela D'Aversa, assistant director of the Jewish Foundation of Greater Toronto, told Norman and his parents, Francy Kussner and Arthur Yallen, about a project that was an excellent match for a boy who plays hockey and baseball and has an extraordinarily good memory for obscure Major League Baseball statistics: a playground in Kiryat Shmonah.

The playground was being built in a disadvantaged area of the city in Israel's north. The city in general, and the area in particular, had been hard-hit by Hezbollah missiles during last summer's war. The playground was meant to be used by kindergarten children during the week, but it would also be a new focal point – and bright spot – for the entire neighbourhood.

On April 10, after celebrating his bar mitzvah at the Beit Yisrael Synagogue in Jerusalem's Yemin Moshe neighnourhood, Norman, his family and friends, and their Israeli tour guide – 27 people in all – went to Kiryat Shmonah to see the playground that Norman's bar mitzvah money had built.

Eran David, who co-ordinates Canada's Israel Emergency Committee projects in northern Israel, met the group's bus beforehand and told them what to expect. "There will be a short ceremony," he explained. "The mayor will say a few words. Nothing fancy."

But when they arrived at the playground, there was a definite feeling of celebration in the air.

A table laden with cookies, pastries and soft drinks greeted the visitors, and a semicircle of chairs had been set up for the guests and local residents, several of whom, including the teacher from the kindergarten, turned out for the event.

In the foreground stood the playground, which was already up and running, complete with a see-saw and other climbing equipment, on which a few neighbourhood children were playing.

A local woman approached Norman's grandmother, Connie Kussner, and told her that there used to be no place for her grandchildren to play, but now all eight of them use the playground, and, like her, they are thrilled it's there.

The group was welcomed with great warmth by representatives from the Jewish Agency, United Israel Appeal Federations Canada and local dignitaries, including Kiryat Shmonah's mayor, Haim Barvivai.

They all wanted to meet and shake hands with "Nachum," the bar mitzvah boy whom Barvivai called a gibor – "hero" – for his generosity.

Norman Yallen and Kiryat Shmonah's mayor, Haim Barvivai

The mayor noted that despite being in the crosshairs of Iran and Hezbollah, the people of Kiryat Shmonah are determined to remain in their beautiful town, the capital of the Galilee. He said that although some people left during the war – an option not open to residents of this neighbourhood, who couldn't afford to leave – every single family returned once the war ended.

The mayor also described how four generations of his family have lived in the town, adding that they are determined to stay, not only for themselves, but for Israel and the Jewish people as a whole.

"Our resolve comes from, among other things, what Nachum did for our city… The distance between Kiryat Shmonah and Toronto is miles and miles, but we feel very close," the mayor said.

At one point during a moving speech that left some in the audience in tears, Barvivai directed everyone's attention to some trees on a hillside in the distance.

During the war, he said, Israel's enemies tried to destroy the trees. "But for every tree that gets burned, we will plant 10 in its place."

The mayor thanked Norman for funding the playground and presented him with some tokens of the city's appreciation, including a box for his tallit and tfillin, and a framed thank-you commemorating the occasion.

The mayor then unveiled a pillar of Jerusalem stone at the side of the playground, and David read out the message on the plaque: "This playground was donated to the children of Kiryat Shmonah by Norman Israel Yallen of Toronto, Canada, on the occasion of his bar mitzvah, Passover 2007."

Norman's mother thanked the mayor on behalf of Norman and his family, and, choking back tears, she said she hoped that some day Norman's children and grandchildren would be able to come to Kiryat Shmonah and see the playground that his bar mitzvah money had built.

Throughout, Norman remained his unflappable, low-key self. But he, too, found the event extremely moving.

"Seeing those happy kids in the playground made it all worthwhile," he said.

Israel Briefs

Help for Gaza evacuees

The Jewish Agency for Israel has launched a rehabilitation program for former Gaza Strip residents. Under the $1.5 million (US) program, some 8,000 Israelis evacuated from Gaza and four West Bank communities in 2005 will be offered career guidance and emotional support. Two years after the evacuations, many of the former residents have not adjusted to their new lives and complain of government inattention. "The evacuees are people who underwent serious trauma and all of the various bodies – the government, donors and voluntary organizations – must work together to help them return to normal," Jewish Agency chairman Zeev Bielski said.

Israel hits Gaza, West Bank

Israeli special forces killed at least 12 Palestinians in the Gaza Strip and West Bank last week. Commandos raided the central Gaza town of Khan Younis as well as Gaza City last Wednesday, killing 11 Palestinians, most of them gunmen from Hamas or Islamic Jihad. Palestinians said a boy was among the dead. Two Israeli soldiers were lightly hurt in the clashes. Outside the West Bank city of Jenin, a Palestinian was killed during a shootout between Israeli paramilitary police and an Islamic Jihad fugitive. The dead man was said to have been the terrorist's brother, but it was not immediately clear if he had also been armed. Palestinians in Gaza retaliated with a rocket salvo against Sderot. No one was hurt.

Arms flow into Lebanon

A UN report about arms flow into Lebanon confirmed Israel's intelligence assessment that Hezbollah is rearming via Syria. The report issued in the UN Security Council found that officials along the Syria-Lebanon border are not stemming the flow of weapons into Lebanon. During a three-week period ending June 15, the UN assessment team did not observe a single instance of border officials seizing arms anywhere along the 200 miles of border the team was monitoring. The Security Council resolution that ended last summer's war between Hezbollah and Israel mandated that the Lebanese army prevent arms flow across the border and into the hands of Hezbollah. The Lebanese and a UN force in the country were supposed to enforce that mandate, but have apparently failed. For months, Israeli intelligence officials have warned that Hezbollah has continued to stockpile weapons via Syria and that the terror group has replenished the arms supplies Israel destroyed during last summer's war.

Crippling back injury leads mother to her dream job

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Felyce Zomparelli could never have known that a freak in-line skating accident that left her bedridden for months would lead her to the most fulfilling career path she could ever imagine.

Zomparelli, a 36-year-old mother of three who has been running her own personal training business since 2003, rose to the challenge of overcoming her immobilizing injury when many others would have given up.

She was just in the beginning stages of her career as a dental assistant when she got into an accident that turned her world upside down.

"I was learning how to Rollerblade and I was blading over to my husband's house – he was my boyfriend at the time – and a car didn't really stop at the stop sign. And I had a choice: hit the car or hit the ground. I hit the ground, thinking it would be a better choice, and it wasn't. I lost feeling in my toe instantly," Zomparelli said.

She had a slipped disc, but she was misdiagnosed by a doctor who treated her ankle instead of her back for two years.

"One day I dropped to the floor. My leg gave out on me," she said, adding that it got so bad that she had to lie on the floor because she couldn't even get into bed.

"I was on a lot of drugs for a long time and I was planning a wedding in the midst of all this. I got engaged about six months after I fell."

Zomparelli wasn't able to walk for three months, until she went through her first back surgery in 1998.

"I got my surgery three weeks before I was to walk down the aisle, and I walked down and I danced at my wedding, and that was amazing," she said.

About a year later, Zomparelli became pregnant with her son, gave birth to him and was eager to lose the baby weight.

She decided that she was going to be a stay-at-home mom and decided to join a gym.

"The personal trainer put me on an exercise that I was never supposed to do. It only took my doing it twice to put me out for three months, and then I went back and designed my own program."

The exercising she was doing was putting a strain on her injured back, and by 2001, she found herself back on an operating table for her second surgery on the same disc.

She was incapacitated once more for a three-month period and was close to falling into a depression.

"When my back started to go bad, I was living with my in-laws, because I couldn't take care of my 18-month old son. We had nothing. Me and my husband had nothing."

Personal trainer Felyce Zomparelli and her children Elizabeth (being held), Connie and Alex.

It was then, she said, that she turned to God for strength.

"I remember over and over again grabbing onto my sink and asking God for not only guidance but strength to see me through this and direct me," she said.

"I was always asking. I'm not a religious person. I'm not shomer Shabbat, I don't keep a kosher house, I don't go to synagogue, but there was just something about asking, and the powers that be give you what you ask for. You just don't always value what is given."

After her physiotherapy, she began to work with a sports rehabilitation therapist for five weeks. He taught her the importance of strengthening "the core" – meaning, back and stomach muscles.

But more importantly, he was the one who suggested she become a trainer and helped her find the courses and internships she needed to pursue this line of work.

"I couldn't go back to my original profession – a dental assistant sitting on my butt all day – so I had to figure out what I was going to do with the rest of my life, because I'm not the sit-down-do-nothing kind of person," she said, adding that she was an overweight teen and has made fitness a part of her life for 20 years.

Her therapist felt she could be a great personal trainer for others like her who have limitations, but are struggling to get back to health.

"Because I know, I can empathize and direct them. I learned this first hand."

Since then, Zomparelli has been certified by the Canadian Personal Trainers Network and has completed internships at the Body and Health Rehabilitation Centre, where she worked with a kinesiologist, as well as at Extreme Fitness, where she was trained by a personal trainer. She has also read numerous books on the subject of training non-athletes with injuries, and she said she is in the best shape of her life.

"If you would have told me on January 1, 2002, that I would give birth to two girls naturally without anesthetic, I would have told you you were nuts. Forget about carrying them for 8 months. But I did it without complications, nothing. And I went back to work three months after they were born," she said, proudly.

Today, Zomparelli has a thriving business and is doing what she loves.

She eagerly jumps out of bed each morning at the crack of dawn to meet one of her 22 clients, and she means business.

"I'm doing a lifestyle change, I'm not doing a quick fix. I'm not interested in taking on clients who are looking to lose 30 pounds in a week."

She expects her clients to follow her direction, exercise regularly and eat well.

"I'm not just a personal trainer. I'm like a life coach."

Despite the challenges that Zomparelli was forced to overcome years ago, now that she is her own boss, working in a field that has always been such an important part of her life, she is thankful for the journey that lead her to where she is today.

"I really do believe that when you are on the right path, God blesses you and and I've been blessed.

"I'm not the richest person on the block, I don't live in the biggest house, but when I started this, I had nothing. Now I have my house, we drive two cars, I have a thriving business and a salary that I never made in my other profession. It blows my mind everyday."

The Winner

I ran to the park, clutching my glove and bat. Summer vacation was finally here, and I wasn't going to waste a minute. Michael and Joey were warming up, throwing high fly balls to each other. Jake and Alexander were sitting on the bench, slurping slurpies. Zev and Ari were setting up the field.

"All right, let's get started," demanded Ari, and everyone gathered together to make teams.

"You go first," said Zev.

"Fine. Michael."

Michael walked over to join Ari.

"Sam," announced Zev.

Ari looked us over, his gaze resting on me. "Gavi."

I'm always one of the first to get picked. I'm a great hitter, and a pretty good fielder.

The selections went on.

"Max."

"Alexander."

"David."

Soon the teams were set. Ari quickly decided the batting order. I was fourth. I usually hit cleanup.

Ben was up first. He hit a high fly to right field. Easy out, but he had nothing to lose. He ran to first.

The right fielder, a boy I didn't know who was wearing a Mets cap, ran for the ball. It went over his head, and bounced twice before he scooped it up. The fielder tried throwing to Zev, who was covering second, but he couldn't throw far enough. Before Zev could get the ball, Ben was safe at third.

Joshua was up next. "C'mon, Josh, get me home!" called Ben from third.

"No problem," answered Joshua cheerily. But three strikes later, he wasn't so cheery.

Joey was next, hitting a grounder to third. Ben wisely stayed put, but Joey beat the throw and reached first safely.

Now I was up. The pitcher threw a curveball. I pulled back.

"Ball one!" called Ari. "Good eye!"

The second pitch was a little low, but I went for it. The force of the metallic crack of bat against ball surged through my arms, and I ran for first. The ball flew deep into right field, and the boy in the Mets cap wasn't doing any better than last time. I went for second. Out of the corner of my eye, I saw Ben and Joey making it home. "Keep going!" yelled Ari, and I headed for third. "Home! Run home!" hollered my teammates. Zev had the ball by now, and he was throwing it home. Desperately, I slid into the plate, the dust billowing up around me, and even Zev had to admit I was safe.

A triumphant roar erupted from my teammates. "Way to go, Gavi!" burst out Ari, slapping me on the back. Right and left, guys were hugging me, slapping me five. "Three-run homer! Yeah! Three zip!"

I took a swig of Coke, feeling like a king.

"C'mon already!" yelled Zev, and the game continued.

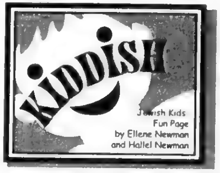
By the end of the third inning, the score was five to four, our lead. I was on deck, practising my swing, when two more guys showed up.

"Hey Ezra! Hey Ilan!" called Ari.

"Hey you guys! Can we join you?"

"Sure, we're each short a player."

Ari and Zev exchanged glances. "I'll take Ezra, you get Ilan," decided Ari.



"No!" burst out Zev. You already have all the good hitters!"

"So I should take Ilan?"

Ilan shrunk. Everyone knew he wasn't such a great player, but they didn't usually make such a big deal about it.

"Listen," declared Ari. "Take Ilan, and I'll give you Gavi."

"For who?"

"For Max."

"Make it David."

"Deal."

The teams reorganized. Nobody dared argue with Zev and Ari.

I put down the bat, scooped up my glove, and headed for the field. That's when it hit me. My homer! The three runs I had scored weren't mine anymore! In fact, we were losing now because of them!

"Gavi!" It was Zev. "Take centre."

A wind was kicking up and the sky was getting dark, just like I felt. I stood there in centre field, completely depressed, utterly betrayed.

I was so lost in my angry thoughts that I almost missed a fly ball. I lunged for it, and caught it. I looked to see who I had just gotten out. It was Ari. Serves him right, I thought, throwing the ball back to the pitcher.

"Three outs!" called Zev, and we switched sides.

I sulked on the bench.

"Gavi." It was Ilan. "Why the long face?"

"Before you got here, I hit a three run homer. And now the runs aren't mine anymore."

"What does that mean? You knocked them in!"

"Now they're being used against me. I don't even know if I want to get any more hits. I'm playing against myself. Either way, I lose."

"You mean, either way, you win."

"Huh?"

"Of course! Your runs are going to win this game, no matter what. The worst you'll do is tie with yourself!"

I looked up. He had a point there.

"Gavi, you're up!"

I stepped up to plate. Whatever happened, I would be the winner. It was a comforting thought.

The wind blew harder. I raised the bat.

"It feels like rain," said Zev.

I looked up.

To the west, there was a flash.

"Lightning!" called Alexander. "Let's get out of here!"

The players scattered as the skies opened up and puddles formed everywhere.

For the second time that day, I was left holding the bat without getting to hit.

Ilan came over to me. "So, who won? You or you?"

"Well..actually nobody. We never even finished the fourth inning. it's a rainout. The whole game never happened."

"Oh."

I was about to add that this was the second time I had missed my chance at bat, when I realized that Ilan had never gotten even a single chance. He was always the last batter in the lineup. Ari and Zev had practically been fighting over who wouldn't have to take him. And here I had been complaining that my three-run homer wasn't being credited to me!

I put my arm around him. His T-shirt was already soaked from the downpour. "Ilan," I said, "I just want to thank you for what you said to me before. It really made my game."

Ilan smiled shyly. "Thanks."

You know, for the second time that day, I felt like a winner. ▼

Wiseman completes play about a furrier and a native trapper

By SHLOMO SCHWARTZBERG

Special to The CJN

You likely haven't heard of Howard Wiseman before but chances are this won't be an unfamiliar name for much longer.

Wiseman was one of the three writers (along with Gerald Wexler and Joe Wiesenfeld) on St. Urbain's Horseman. They worked on the much-anticipated four-hour TV adaptation of Mordecai Richler's acclaimed St. Urbain's Horseman, which airs on CBC this fall.

Wiseman's superb play The Year of the Flood, which draws on his Winnipeg roots to tell the powerful story of the long friendship between a Jewish fur store owner and native trapper, and their fractious relationship with their sons, recently had a final reading at Toronto's Miles Nadal JCC.

And he's hard at work on a feature film, tentatively titled The Long Haul, a Winnipeg-set crime story, for which he has received development money. As if that's not enough, Wiseman also teaches screenwriting full time at York University.

Those are quite a range of credits for one person. Wiseman was also a cellist for a short time in legendary Canadian rock band Lighthouse and has written and directed for several TV crimes series, including EXHIBIT A and 72 Hours: True Crime – but it's The Year of the Flood, set during 1949-50, which currently occupies most of his thoughts and efforts.

"It's based on my grandfather who was a furrier in Winnipeg. One of the native men he used to work with lived… north of Winnipeg, and I would go with my grandfather out fishing and meet the guy. He became fictionalized in the play, where it's not a specific individual," Wiseman says.

Howard Wiseman

"That man and his son were people in my life, and when my grandfather passed away way back in the '70s, I went out to the son of that man that I based the lead character on and I talked to him. That speech pattern is still in my ear and still appears in the play.

"The play's about loss, how to deal with loss, loss of power, loss of hopes and dreams and ambition, and then the idea of the flood sweeping things away. It brings all the emotion to the fore so in terms of these two old men, these two leaders, they have to deal with their power passing along to the next generation, which they are fighting against in a King Lear-like fashion. The other things that's important to me [are] the sons' point of view, [their] struggling to get out from under these larger-than-life characters," he says.

Wiseman, who is in his early 50s, is gung-ho about the final draft of his long-gestating pet project. "I'm at the stage where I'm going to incorporate some of the changes from our final reading into the completed play. It's still really, really good what came up between the actors and me from one draft to the next – [it] was excellent." (He's also written it as a film script, adding the character of a game warden, who functions as an antagonist to propel the story along.)

Working on St. Urbain's Horseman was not the same satisfying experience, he says, namely because his was not the sole voice adapting Richler's novel for TV. Thus, only some of Wiseman's original teleplay will be evident in the final version of the miniseries.

"That happens frequently in film and television. You can [keep] possession for the time you're doing the project, [which is] when you got to protect it fiercely at that time. Then there are all these other individuals [involved]. You have to start working with the director and there's the network and there's financing, and everybody has a kick at the can so to speak," he says.

Much more rewarding for Wiseman was a radio adaptation of Richler's final novel, Barney's Version, which won him a Writer's Guild (of America) award after it aired on CBC radio in 2003. Since the stakes are financially lower in radio, Wiseman, who also won third place at the New York guild's awards for his 1998 radio adaptation of Richler's Solomon Gursky Was Here, feels he has more freedom as a writer in that medium than in a big, expensive TV production. (He was not, however, invited to participate in the forthcoming film adaptation of Barney's Version.)

Wiseman is the eldest in a family of four artistically inclined brothers. Gord is an immigration lawyer and also a playwright (he wrote the play Einstein), who writes under the name Gabriel Emmanuel. Ron Wiseman has immigrated to Israel, where he specializes in a form of music dubbed Hebrew reggae. Bobby Wiseman, probably the best known of the four brothers, made his name as a piano player in the Canadian group Blue Rodeo and now performs, both with his musician wife, Maguli Meagher (of The Phomemes) and as a solo act.

"My mother is a painter, also a piano player. We grew up having family jams; we'd basically be banging on pots and pans," Wiseman says. "My father was the encourager of it all. He passed away five years ago, [but] one of his greatest thrills was that I was doing Barney's Version. He really enjoyed that."

Despite his long and varied career, Wiseman still displays a modest, "Canadian" view of his accomplishments. "It's taken me a long time to get to a place where I feel that I can, perhaps, tell some stories well."

Audiences who catch his work in the future will likely agree.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

CONVERSATION WITH BRITISH NOVELIST OLIVIA LICHTENSTEIN

"People often decide that it's time for them to get married and then marry whomever they happen to be with at that moment… so you don't necessarily marry the right person, you just marry the person who's there."

That isn't British novelist Olivia Lichtenstein talking, just the lead character from her first novel, Mrs. Zhivago of Queen's Park, which was published by Orion Books of the United Kingdom earlier this year and has already been sold to 10 countries.

Lichtenstein, a documentary filmmaker with the BBC for many years, was in town recently and spoke with Eye On Arts about her book, which tiptoes into the rather indelicate area of adultery. The book is a lighthearted and entertaining romp into the heart of a moral question that has been a major theme of literature ever since Madame Bovary, Anna Karenina – and yes, Dr. Zhivago – hit the bookstalls.

"I think what I was trying to do is to address a topic of conversation between myself and my girlfriends," Lichtenstein said. "There's a kind of restlessness that overtakes married people. I think that rather than having an affair, it would be a good idea to write about one instead."

The book's protagonist is Chloe Zhivago, a 40-ish mother who has been married to Greg for what feels like an eternity. When she meets a handsome Russian named Ivan, she is tempted to risk a passionate romance "before gravity wins the battle with her face and figure."

Like the writer herself, Lichtenstein's heroine is Jewish. "That's important to her, even though she's not religious," she said. "It's important because of the values it instilled in her, the most important of which is family and the need to preserve the family at all costs."

It won't be giving away too much to reveal that the story ultimately serves as an endorsement of the institution of marriage: one reviewer called the book "a surprisingly moral fable," and another said it "could turn husbands back into lovers."

"I suppose if there's an ultimate message, it's that you shouldn't give up on marriage too easily," said Lichtenstein, whose book will seem a perfect summer read for women at the beach or cottage. Not only does it touch a popular domestic chord, each of its chapters offers a different recipe. Interestingly, the book is being marketed under a different title – Chloe Zhivago's Recipe for Marriage and Mischief – in the United States. "They tested it and found that the English title made Americans think of a little old lady living in Queens," the author said. "They didn't think it accurately reflected what the book was about."

Mrs. Zhivago of Queen's Park is available in bookstores.

Recently in Print: Well-known crime writer Max Haines has written a memoir, The Spitting Champion of the World: Memories of Antigonish, recounting his Nova Scotia boyhood in a series of stories. The book is published by Viking Canada.

Halifax singer Sheva debuts album

25-year-old charms audience with pop sensibility

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

It's got loads of piano, pop sensibility, passion, vocal purity, power, panache and slick production values.

Put it all together and you get a debut album called The Closest Thing, an imminently radio-friendly CD that signals the coming-out party of Halifax, N.S. singer/songwriter, Sheva Solomon.

Released in May by California's UE3 Records label, and full of songs that can stand toe-to-toe with any of the best adult contemporary/soft-rock tunes out there, The Closest Thing should soon provide radio stations with instant hits and pay immediate dividends for the 25-year-old artist.

The CJN caught her first one on June 20, as she promoted the album at the Eaton Centre Indigo bookstore.

As soon as she began her set, shoppers stopped dead in their tracks to listen to the sweet music emanating from the store's upper level.

Sheva's years of classical voice training comes through loud and clear in her live performance and on her album in the form of deep, rich and sensual vocals.

Though she said she was naturally shy and reflective, her onstage persona was captivating as she engaged in friendly banter with her audience, charming them from behind her keyboard.

the closest thing

"I just finished five shows with an Elton John tribute band," she kibitzed to onlookers. "I have him stuck in my brain. One of these days I'm gonna learn Benny and the Jets. But for now, I'm going to play you one of my songs."

She then launched into a series of emotive ballads from her album, including her first single release, the title track, and Song For Myself, a haunting and catchy tune she wrote as a metaphor for her own struggle to become a successful artist.

Born into a mixed religious family in Bridgetown N.S., her father is Jewish and mother Baptist, Sheva grew up benefiting from both heritages.

"We had both Chanukah and Christmas. Two months of presents," she joked. "There was only one other Jewish family [in Bridgetown]. So my mom helped teach us about [Judaism], because she knew it was important to know my background is important, and it always will be."

She credits her parents' love of classical music and their insistence she listen only to the classics, for her love and abilities for musical composition.

"I'm less a storyteller and more about the music," she said, adding that her method is to compose a song before adding the lyrics. "I think that comes from classical music training."

Produced by Dale Penner, an in-demand studio whiz who's worked with other Canadian pop acts like Holly McNarland, Nickelback and the Matthew Good Band, The Closest Thing makes Sheva sound like she's been at this for years.

"I have a team who are building my story. We're focusing on grassroots [promotion] in the best way we can, so I can handle it slowly until we eventually build up for the L.A. thing," she said.

It's fitting that Sheva counts Sarah McLachlan among her Myspace friends, as much of her music can be compared in style and tone to the Canadian soft-rock icon.

And she knows she could do worse than to have comparisons with seasoned music veterans.

"I had no thought about being like anyone else," Sheva said. "I know I get [the Sarah Mclachlan comparison] because of my piano. People also say I sound like Amy Lee of Evanescence. I don't mind when people compare me, I know that my music is similar... but not."

CD compared to Canadian Sarah McLachlan

The Canadian leg of Sheva's tour was scheduled to wrap up June 27 with two dates in Montreal. She'll be playing one more show this year, back home in Halifax on Oct. 5 at the Rebeccca Cohn Auditorium.

"In the end it's all about music and giving it your all," Sheva said. "I just want to move people. Whether I'm playing at a bar or at a bookstore with 40 people watching, it's all about moving that one person with my music."

If The Closest Thing is any indication of what's to come from this talented woman, chances are she'll be moving way more people than that for quite some time.

YouTube 'wig out' boosts actor's career

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Torontonian Ingrid Haas is one of the four actors who has been vaulted into the public eye by an often viewed and much debated video uploaded to YouTube last January.

Bride Has Massive Hair Wig Out appears to be an amateur video of three bridesmaids attempting to calm down a bride on her wedding. The bride hates her salon hairdo so much that she completely "wigs out" and hacks off her hair.

Debate over the video's authenticity has proliferated, both in the blogosphere and the general media. Canadian filmmaker Norman Jewison was even asked to weigh in, as the film was rumoured to have been shot in Toronto. (In fact, the video was shot at the Four Points Sheraton Lakeshore hotel in Toronto.)

Two weeks after the video was uploaded, the company Unilever revealed that the video was a marketing tool for one of its subsidiaries, Sunsilk, and was being used to promote a new hair-care line.

"Nobody thought it was going to be so big. We just thought we would be getting the term [wig out] out into the mainstream, so they [Sunsilk] could use it in something else, like a commercial," Haas said.

Jodi Behan, 22, played "Bridezilla," as the character is now nicknamed, and did indeed chop her locks. Haas, 24, played a bridesmaid filming the catastrophe and is never seen on camera. The other two bridesmaids are played by Behan's real-life sister, Jessie, and Esther Orosz.

The piece was filmed and directed by John Griffith, who approached Haas to write the script after seeing her in a play and at the Yorkville restaurant, Hemingways, where she worked.

"It sounded like a lot of fun," said Haas, a recent Ryerson University theatre graduate. "You learn that you should just jump at any opportunity."

She wrote a script, but said the video, which was shot in one take, was mostly improvised.

Haas was hired to write 10 similar scripts for Sunsilk, but after the first one got so much attention, they didn't need any more, she said.

"We uploaded and about a week later it blew up, and off to L.A. we went."

Toronto actress Ingrid Haas

When Unilever announced that Sunsilk was behind the popular clip, the four actresses flew to L.A. to be swept up in a media furor that included two spots on Good Morning America.

The four girls then signed with Gersh Agency, a well-known American talent agency, and are now pursuing career options, both separately and together.

Haas is working on a movie pitch for Paramount Pictures. She also has a television series in the works, for the four actors to star in together, and is working on a one-woman show that she hopes to get off the ground in the fall.

Haas called her experience over the last few months lucky, bizarre and exciting.

"This path to my acting career has been paved by YouTube. I could have had all the training in the world, and the doors that have been opened would not have been opened had this not have happened," she said.

"If everything works out the way I plan it to, I'll be back in L.A. in the fall. I want to have a long career in both Canada and the United States."

Haas is aware of the 15 minutes of fame phenomenon, and does not want to fall victim to it.

"All I want is for this not to be just a media frenzy," she said. "Hopefully, in the long term, it's just one little speck."

Up next for Haas is a starring role in the Blyth Festival's Queen Milli of Galt, a play about a small-town girl who falls in love with the Prince of Wales, from July 4 to Aug. 11. Blythe, Ont., is a three-hour drive from Toronto.

"It's been such a wonderful path," Haas said of her accomplishments to date. "I feel so successful at such an early time, and it's only the beginning."

Tongue-in-cheek comedy skewers Hollywood

By LARRY ANKLEWICZ
Special to The CJN

For Your Consideration is a tongue-in-cheek comedy that skewers Hollywood and the subculture that drives it. Director Christopher Guest, who previously tackled the folk music scene with A Mighty Wind, looked at the world of dog shows in Best in Show and satirized small-town theatre in Waiting For Guffman, now turns his attention to the overblown egos and self-indulgent world of the movies.

For Your Consideration is a hilarious look at what happens when Hollywood actors begin to believe their own publicity and when a rumour about possible Academy Award nominations is initiated.

The cast and crew for a small independent production called Home For Purim are working diligently to complete a modest melodrama and imbue it with some heart and meaning.

Things, however, begin to turn sour when veteran actress Marilyn Hack, played by Catherine O'Hara, hears that her current role as the matriarch of a southern Jewish family may be up for consideration for an Oscar. The rumours begin to fly, and at one point, all the main cast members begin to believe that they, too, might be considered as Academy Award material.

The film shows the jealousies and conflicts that can come to the surface when some cast members appear to be receiving more attention than others.

The film also satirizes such Hollywood conventions as agents, television entertainment shows that feed the rumour mill, and people who take themselves much too seriously.

Eugene Levy is terrific as the scheming agent who is out to maximize his career, Parker Posy plays the truculent standup comedian who plays the daughter in the film within the film, and Harry Shearer is the unrecognized dramatic actor who is trying to make a film that will raise his profile.

The film is funny and often hits the mark with its acerbic humour, especially when the suits from the executive suite come on set and begin to make changes that will make the film more accessible to the mainstream audience.

Although there is much to like in this film, and one of the highlights for me was watching the Purim Song cast of the film within a film perform, it does seem to falter toward the end and never really brings the film to a satisfactory conclusion. But there are some great moments and lots of laughs.

The DVD of For Your Consideration contains an audio commentary by Guest and Levy, more than 30 minutes of bonus material and a Home For Purim poster gallery.

Another new DVD release is a film called Checking Out.

Peter Falk stars as a retired Jewish actor who played on the Broadway stage for years. As his 90th birthday approaches, he invites his three children to celebrate the event and then he informs them that, at the conclusion of the festivities, he will commit suicide.

The children come in from different parts of the country in an attempt to convince their father that life is still worth living. In addition to Falk, the film features Laura San Giacomo, David Paymer, Judge Reinhold, Dan Byrd and Mary Winstead.

Memoir and novel recall Toronto in earlier days

Rifke: An Improbable Life* by Rosalie Wise Sharp, ECW Press.

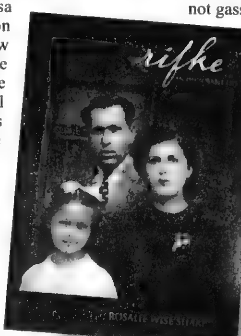
By BILL GLADSTONE
Special to The CJN

Rosalie Wise Sharp, a daughter of Polish immigrants, always felt that heaven had mismatched her with her parents, Joseph and Ydessa Wise, who ran a dry goods store on north Yonge Street at a time when few Jews lived in north Toronto. Later, fate matched her up with husband Isadore Sharp, founder of the international Four Seasons chain of luxurious hotels and resorts, adding a fairy-tale lustre to her life.



In this charmingly honest, open and well-written memoir, Rosalie (Rifke, by her Jewish name) describes her life as "improbable." Some may find it even more improbable that a spouse of an extraordinary Canadian should also have rare talents of her own. Yet she does, and not only as an interior decorator and art designer who helped the Four Seasons attain its trademark style combining opulence, fine taste and comfort.

Rosalie was born in Toronto in 1936 to parents who had come from Ozarow via Montreal; for years the family lived above a store on Yonge Street north of Lawrence Avenue, then in a house nearby. "It was a shtetl household," Rosalie writes, recounting that, because her parents retained their old-world values, her life and world were very different from those of her Gentile friends. Many of her mother's colourful Yiddish aphorisms decorate the prose and provide a rich sense of the shtetl mentality that permeated Rosalie's childhood (for example, A farshporer iz beser vi a fardiner – A saver is better than an earner).

The feeling of separateness was enhanced by Rosalie's knowledge of the tragic fate that befell most of her parents' relatives who stayed in Europe and perished in the Holocaust. "All this while my friends were taking tap-dancing lessons and playing the flute and swimming in sunny country lakes. There was an unreality about going to school with kids who belonged in the neighbourhood – whose grandmothers were not gassed but took them to see the Nutcracker ballet at Christmas. Where was the real world? I led a double life."

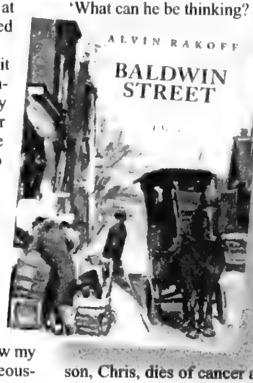
The book also offers a revealing portrait of Issy, whose legendary skill as a bargainer and negotiator were tested early on by Rosalie's father, who had forbidden her from seeing him and locked her out of the house when she disobeyed. Issy, who "always faces a problem head on," went immediately to his future father-in-law for a decisive discussion. Rosalie walked meekly behind.

"We found my dad reading the [Toronto] Telegram, sitting woodenly on the couch, where he could always be found. Issy began making his case politely and quietly in his positive, winning way, and my father was obviously impressed. As Issy spoke, I saw my father's expression transform from haughty self-righteousness to the subdued demeanour of a humbled child. From that time, my father fell in my eyes. At that Freudian moment when Issy took charge, I transferred my allegiance from my father to my lover."

A humble and seemingly ordinary Jarvis Street motel was the genesis for Sharp's vast billion-dollar hotel empire: the next step was a planned edifice in suburban Don Mills that no one could have predicted would succeed.

"I would like to claim I had a hand in my husband's great success, but if I did, it was only because I kept quiet and didn't tell the truth about my fears for some of his schemes," Rosalie writes. "Like the summer's day in 1961 when we drove up to the corner of Eglinton Avenue and Leslie Street in Toronto, to a hilly meadow of tall grass. 'Here,' said Issy, 'is the site for the second hotel, the Inn on the Park. What do you think?'

"There was not another building in sight, trucks were turning into a municipal garbage dump across the road, and just then a CPR freight train roared by the property. I thought, 'What can he be thinking? Real hotels are always downtown, usually handy to the railroad station, and have regal names like Royal York, King Edward, and Prince George.'"



Wisely, however, she kept her doubts to herself, and did so again when he told her his aim was to make the name Four Seasons synonymous with luxury, like Rolls-Royce. "My most valuable contribution to his success," she writes, "has been my silence."

Like a princess without airs, she also lets us into her family life: we get to meet the couple's four sons, and share in the devastating tragedy when the third son, Chris, dies of cancer at age 18 in 1978. Pages are also devoted to Rosalie's love of ceramics, the family's various homes, descriptions of a few of the many luxurious trips that she and Issy have taken; and her mother's Birnbaum relatives in Ozarow, who wrote letters to Toronto until a black curtain of silence fell in 1939. "The Birnbaums for me are forever shrouded in mystery because they are frozen in time – vanished in the smoke of the Holocaust."

For many, Rifke: An Improbable Life will evoke memories of the city from a former time and the generation of wartime immigrant Jews whose numbers are thinning. Enhanced with many photos and several drawings and genealogical charts, it is an engaging memoir with a logical theme that rings true.

Baldwin Street. A Novel*, by Alvin Rakoff, published by Bunim & Bannigan.

Alvin Rakoff, author of this novel & Gillian, is proof of the old maxim that you can take the boy out of the country, but you can't take the country out of the boy. An accomplished film producer and director based in London, England, he now offers us a series of linked stories that take place in the richly remembered domain of his boyhood.

Rakoff's setting is Kensington Market and the Baldwin Street of his youth, as seen through the eyes of his young protagonist, Leonard Abelson. Leonard has a knack for being in the right place at the right time and thus becoming privy to secrets and liaisons that would have eluded most others. He is a casual observer in some stories and an active participant in others; most are told in the third person but a few utilize Leonard's own first-person narration. The technique adds depth and realism to the fictional world that Rakoff creates.

With a sure hand and trademark short sentences that sometimes seem too clipped, Rakoff presents a parade of colourful portraits and vignettes, veering from the unusual to the grotesque. In one well developed and richly painted story, Effie, a Yiddish-speaking black woman, becomes a trusted accountant for a Jewish businessman. In another, Murray Millstein, who lives on Augusta Avenue, is deeply affected by the loss of his wife and starts going to market dressed in her clothing. The Verys focuses on Melvyn and Goldie Rabinowitz, a mismatched husband and wife (respectively very small and very big) who come to Leonard, by this time of college age, for advice.

Redolent of the atmosphere of the old market of the prewar era, this package of linked narratives is well made and charming. Although collectively these stories lack sufficient unity to be considered a novel, they make for rewarding reading just the same.

NOW, MORE THAN EVER!

Author/journalist Andrew Cohen charts the state of Canada

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Andrew Cohen takes the pulse of the nation. An author, journalist and professor, he recently published his fourth book on Canada, The Unfinished Canadian: The People We Are (McClelland & Stewart), a mix of reportage and reflection.

Although he regards himself as "a passionate Canadian," his latest work is more critical than congratulatory.

"It's not a valentine to Canada," he said in an interview in the sunny courtyard of a midtown European-style cafe. "It's edgy and politically incorrect. It hits hot buttons and delivers home truths."

He wrote The Unfinished Canadian – which follows in the wake of While Canada Slept: How We Lost Our Place in the World, a bestseller and a finalist for the Governor General's Literary Award – out of concern that Canadians are generally too satisfied with platitudes.

"We're not given to hard assessments of who we are," he explained, hastening to add that he does not consider himself "a smasher of icons."

In The Unfinished Canadian, Cohen – a former Globe and Mail columnist, editorial writer and foreign correspondent who now teaches journalism and international affairs at Carleton University in Ottawa– focuses primarily on the nature of Canadian identity.

But in examining this existential issue, he provides a cogent analysis of Canada's past, present and possible future and poses tough questions turning on, among other contemporary topics, Canadian history and multiculturalism.

A two-time winner of the National Newspaper Award and a finalist last year, he believes that Canadians have failed to forge a clear sense of themselves, notwithstanding Canada's recent fulsome homage to Canadian soldiers who fought heroically at the Battle of Vimy Ridge in World War I.

"I'm all for building a stronger sense of who we are," said Cohen, who defines Canadians as "the product of memory, geography, complexity and uncertainty."

One problem is that Canadians neglect, even ignore, their rich and varied history, he observed, quoting distinguished historian J.L. Granatstein.

"We should be celebrating it because we have a lot to be proud of," said Cohen. "We settled a continent, built great cities and absorbed waves of immigrants. We do have an interesting history."

Yet only half of Canadians can identify Sir John A. Macdonald as Canada's first prime minister and barely two-thirds know that Canada is composed of 10 provinces and three territories.

Lamentably, only three provinces require high school students to study Canadian history, but there are other problems as well, Cohen pointed out.

The homes of many former Canadian prime ministers have not been designated as historic sites, while Canadian historical figures, ranging from scientists to artists, have rarely been celebrated.

It's time to get serious about Canadian history. "We can do this in a progressive way, introducing Canada's past to students in primary school and carrying it through secondary school," he writes.

Andrew Cohen

In Cohen's opinion, Canada should foster what he calls "a new patriotism" by requiring citizens to serve in the military or the Canada Corps, which was established three years ago.

There is also a need to foster pride in the national capital, Ottawa, he noted.

Yet Cohen acknowledges that Canada, for all its manifold accomplishments, has sometimes hung by a thread. In an allusion to "the precariousness of our nation," he referred to the conscription crises of 1917 and 1944, the 1970 October crisis and the 1995 Quebec referendum, which separatists almost won.

"We're trying to keep Canada together. That's our huge challenge."

Yet Cohen does not regard the spectre of separatism as Canada's greatest threat. More likely, the threats to Canada will derive from immigration and decentralization.

The degradation of the environment and deepening poverty will force millions of Africans and Asians to leave their respective countries in the next 50 years and thereby force Canada to increase immigration levels.

Cohen predicted that Canada will then face the arduous task of successfully integrating these newcomers by trying to convince them to adopt common Canadian values.

No one, least of all Cohen, has any idea what the outcome of this conundrum will be. He posed a rhetorical question, "Can civic nationalism trump ethnicity?"

Asked to comment on the prevalence of Islamic extremism among a minority of Muslim immigrants, Cohen said, "We ask of all Canadians to embrace the rule of law and tolerance. If they're a source of radicalism and hatred, then they would be a threat. Anyone who comes here clinging to old hatreds and prejudices concerns me."

Cohen has doubts about Canada's policy of fostering multiculturalism. "I'm not sure it's a cohesive force. We're becoming an archipelago of ethnic enclaves."

The second major threat to Canada's continued existence, quiet devolution, emanates from provinces demanding still more powers.

As he puts it, "If unchecked, devolution will balkanize Canada. The failure of the centre to hold, and the division of Canada into fiefdoms, will be exacerbated by the elements of our character: the failure of memory, the weakness of citizenship, the tolerance of ethnic nationalism, the willingness to compromise one too many times."

A McGill University graduate born and raised in Montreal, and now a syndicated columnist for the Ottawa Citizen, Cohen is amazed at how Canada has changed since his childhood.

"We're more of a diverse and interesting country," said Cohen, 52, the scion of an old Russian Jewish family that played a central role in the founding of the Canadian Jewish Congress in 1919. "We've set up a social welfare system. We have our own flag. We've had to fight separatism and Western alienation."

Despite Canada's current problems, and the uncertainties it may well confront one day, he is confident that the sun will shine on Canada.

"Canada is a colon rather than a question mark," he said. "The best years are yet to come. Canada is blessed, but our challenge is to be worthy of it."

He dedicates The Unfinished Canadian to his late father, Edgar Horace, a businessman, amateur historian and valued friend who died last summer as he was completing the manuscript.

"He was my best editor," said Cohen, whose previous books were A Deal Undone: The Making and Breaking of the Meech Lake Accord and Trudeau's Shadow: The Life and Legacy of Pierre Elliottt Trudeau (with J.L. Granatstein). "He found mistakes editors had missed."

Next month, Cohen and his family – wife and fellow journalist Mary Gooderham and two children Alexander Elliot and Rachel Hannah -- will relocate to Berlin for his sabbatical.

"It's a fascinating place," said Cohen, who intends to gather research for a forthcoming book about Germany, the Holocaust and public memory.

Robert Fulford delivered keynote

Drunk from the Bitter Truth: The Poems of Anna Margolin. The poems were originally published in 1929 and given new life in Kumove's translation.

"When I first read Anna Margolin's poems, they had a powerful visceral effect on me, and I began to translate a few of them as a way of understanding what she was saying," Kumove said. "That was 18 years ago… By bestowing this award on me, you have acknowledged one of the great Yiddish poets."

Two living Canadian poets were also honoured: Rafi Aaron for Surviving the Censor: The Unspoken Words of Osip Mandelstam (Seraphim Editions); and Seymour Mayne for September Rain (Mosaic Press).

For the first time, the awards committee handed out a Special Publisher Recognition Award. It went to Margie Wolfe, founder of Second Story Press, a highly successful feminist publishing house that since 1988 has published about 180 books, including some 14 books of Jewish content. Thematically Jewish titles have included Found Treasures, A Partisan's Memoirs, Hana's Suitcase, Clara's War, The Night Spies, Bobbie Rosenfeld: The Olympian Who Could Do Everything and Hiding Edith.

"I'm almost speechless – but not quite," said Wolfe, who went on to exuberantly outline the vast reach of Second Story Press publications, particular those in its Holocaust Remembrance Books for Young Readers series, around the globe.

"It's wonderful that people in Poland, Germany and other parts of eastern Europe are reading parts of their own history – history that they may not have read except for the books that we are getting over there," she said. "And we couldn't have done it without our writers," she added, commending Karen Levine, Kathy Kacer, Anne Dublin and other scribes.

For many, the highlight of the evening was Robert Fulford's learned and entertaining discussion on Jewish writers that have influenced him. At the top of his list was an unlikely name – A.J. Liebling (1904-1963), the American writer whom Fulford described as the best press critic in America of his day.

"Liebling was never interested in asserting his Jewishness and in certain ways he wanted to avoid it. As I came to realize later on, that was one of his Jewish qualities," said the celebrated cultural critic and National Post columnist.

Philip Roth, Irving Howe and Saul Bellow are among the New York intellectuals who Fulford cited as specific influences on him. He especially lauded their direct style of disputation, which allowed them to sharpen their ideas, a practice he learned to emulate.

Of talmudic origin, the Jewish habit of disputation has helped the Jewish people to survive and prosper in the modern era, Fulford said, noting that theologian James Parkes described the Talmud as a "portable homeland" and intellectual shelter that united the Jews throughout their long exile.

Most prize winners received an award in the neighbourhood of $500 to $1,000 from a multitude of donors.

The CJN wins Rockowers

Prof. Norm Ravvin, The CJN's regular book reviewer, received second-place honours for excellence in arts and critical analysis for his column, "A writer's long and dangerous war," about Vasily Grossman's book on his experiences as a war correspondent with the Red Army during World War II.

Jenny Hazan, The CJN's correspondent in Israel, won a third-place award in the special Nefesh B'Nefesh category for writing about Israel for her story "Ex-Montrealer is Israel's newest homeboy."

It was the 12th time in 13 years that The CJN has won Rockower awards.

Concordia back from Israel with two tournament wins

By BEN RABY
Special to The CJN

MONTREAL — The Concordia Stingers men's basketball team recently returned to Montreal after a 16-day stay in Israel. They brought with them two tournament titles and an experience they won't soon forget.

For a team that knew little about the country they were visiting, and even less about the competition they would face, the Stingers managed to do just fine, winning 12 of 13 games.

"They were great ambassadors," coach John Dore said of his team. "They took in all the sights, they met and communicated with people of different cultural backgrounds, and they also played some pretty good basketball – the best I've seen some of them ever play."

Not bad for a trip that was funded almost entirely by private donations and sponsors.

The Stingers' second championship in Israel came at the second annual Friendship Games, a Tel Aviv-based international event with teams from 17 countries. Concordia, known in Israel as Team Canada, beat defending champion Serbia 45-40 in the final.

"You can't ask for a better trip," said graduating Stinger and tournament MVP Patrick Perrotte. "The rookies stepped up, and that's what [an off-season] trip like this is about. It's about getting the experience."

Nine Stingers travelled to Israel, and that meant significant playing time for all, even those who rarely got off the bench during the regular season.

"It was very rewarding to be able to celebrate the win, knowing the sacrifices we made for this trip," said first-year Stinger Desmond Murphy. "We showed why we're one of the best teams in Canada."

Israelis are known for elaborate post-game ceremonies, something the Stingers had discovered a week earlier after beating Estonia in a warm-up tournament final in Be'er Sheva.

At the Friendship Games, however, it took 40 minutes for the post-game festivities to even begin. The man designated to hand the Stingers their championship trophies was running late. Apparently newly installed President Shimon Peres had other things to do that afternoon.

But for a school that had to wait nearly five years since its last meet-and-greet with an Israeli VIP, a September 2002 visit by former Prime Minister Benjamin Netanyahu marred by anti-Israel riots in Montreal, Peres' 40-minute delay could barely be considered an inconvenience.

Some members of Concordia's travelling contingency spoke Hebrew to the Israeli leader while the players took pictures and waved the Canadian flag around centre court.

"[He] could be the next prime minister," said third-year Stinger Andre Johnny. "I'm not sure how many of us knew of him before, but it's not everyday that you meet someone of that status on the world stage."

The meeting with Peres, the championship game and even Concordia's trip to Israel itself would not have been possible if not for the Friendship Games, a basketball tournament that aims to promote peace through sport. It was conceived by the NBA's Atlanta Hawks owner Ed Peskowitz.

"I was in Israel a few years ago, and I saw the country's love for basketball," said Peskowitz. "I knew it was big in all the Middle Eastern countries, so I said, 'Let's do this. Let's bring together Arabs, Jews, Christians, Muslims and people of all different faiths to an environment in which they can all share the same basketball court.'"

"It's a tournament that aims to build bridges and it's a real eye-opener for our guys to get to see this," Dore said.

Concordia's first game in Tel Aviv was a blowout win against Nazareth, an Israel-based team made up entirely of Arabs. They represent the only Arab team in an otherwise Jewish basketball league.

"We prefer to just focus on our basketball," said team member Yousef Hassin, "but every time we play, people ask about our situation. We recognize it's different, but it doesn't bother us and it doesn't bother the other teams."

Hassin said he and his teammates often have drinks after a game with members of the Jewish teams in their league. It's a rare scene in Israel, but one that Peskowitz hopes can be recreated every year at his tournament.

"We're not being naive about it," Peskowitz said. "This can't change the world, but it is a small step. To see people who are diametrically opposed coming together for basketball, sharing laughs and having a common experience, it's great stuff. It's not the Paris Peace Accord, but it is a step in the right direction."

Peskowitz seems committed to seeing this tournament grow. He has agreed to donate $1 million US in each of the next eight years to keep it running.

A return visit from the Stingers is possible, but Dore said it's no guarantee.

"They've already started to put pressure on us to go back and defend our title," Dore said. "But it took lots of work, and fundraising just to make it possible for this year.

"It's something we'd like to do again, but it all depends on the finances."

When not playing basketball, the Stingers' itinerary included sightseeing to Masada, the Old City in Jerusalem and the Dead Sea.

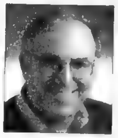
'Talk to me': the challenge of communication

By MICHAEL GORDON



The Senior Side of Life

The following occurs frequently in my geriatric medicine assessment clinic, and likely in medical offices around the world: we see an older person who is accompanied by a younger family member. The doctor proceeds to talk primarily, if not exclusively, to the family member, almost ignoring the patient. This is especially so if it is known that the patient suffers from cognitive impairment or has sensory problems such as hearing loss.

In modern medical offices, this tendency may be exacerbated by the use of the popular shift to the electronic health record. Many physicians are typing and reading as they speak, a situation that increases the likelihood that they will be distracted from direct verbal patient interaction.

Because of this tendency, I have, over the years, arranged my office in such a way that the patient and the primary family member or members are sitting in a position that enables me to make eye contact with all of them. I try to focus my attention first on the patient, greet him or her and have some verbal interaction about how they are or have been since our previous visit.

I then ask them if I should speak primarily to their accompanying family member. The response is almost always positive, and I can then direct further questions to the family member, all the time trying to keep looking from one to the other.

Another technique I have tried to maintain is that from time to time after speaking to the family member, I ask the patient for his or her comments on what has been said.

Depending on the nature of the medical condition, the degree of interaction and dialogue with the patient as compared to that with the family member may vary. There are many times when I am trying to assess the ability of the patient to provide reliable information and I have to remind the family members, sometimes more than once, to avoid interjecting their comments, even when their loved one turns to them for input, which is very common with individuals suffering from cognitive impairment or dementia.

When I observe the dynamic, content, and responsiveness to such questioning, it is usually possible to assess the cognitive capabilities of the person to some extent and understand the degree of dependency the patient may have on the direction and cognitive input of the family member.

Such an interactive arrangement appears to take more time than simply speaking to the cognitively intact family member, but it is less rich in terms of understanding what is actually going on. Thus, it is important for physicians to remind themselves of the importance of such efforts to engage with their patients, irrespective of the degree of cognitive impairment.

A well-known neuro-psychologist, Steven Sabat, has written extensively on the language difficulties and patterns of speech and communication in individuals with Alzheimer's. In his outstanding book, The Experience of Alzheimer's Disease – Life through a Tangled Veil (Blackwell 2001), he promotes the concept of careful listening and finding the meaning behind what might otherwise seems to be garbled and disconnected language.

A parallel situation often occurs when members of the service industry, such as shop clerks and salespeople, tend to speak to younger family members who are accompanying an older relative, without first attempting to address the older person – even if the elder of the two is clearly the primary customer. It sometimes seems as if the person is invisible.

When this happens, as gently as possible, we should redirect the sales staff back to the customer, to acknowledge the older person's visibility, vibrancy and individuality and ensure that he or she is directly addressed and listened to.

SALMON STEAK W/ ORANGE-BALSAMIC GLAZE

Marinade:
1/4 c orange juice concentrate (frozen)
1/4 cup balsamic vinegar
1 tblsp. extra-virgin olive oil
2 cloves garlic, finely chopped
1 tblsp. finely chopped fresh rosemary
1/2 tsp. salt
1/8 tsp. freshly ground black pepper

4 salmon steaks Vegetable cooking spray

Place marinade ingredients in large sealable plastic bag. Shake well. Add salmon and refrigerate up to 1 hr. Remove steaks from marinade; pat dry with paper towel. Coat grill with cooking spray; heat on high. Grill steaks, turning once halfway through, until no longer translucent in the center, about 4 minutes per side.

Epi on Education

Seymour Epstein

In my last article (June 7), I attempted to explore the meaning of Jewish literacy by analyzing the process of acquiring literacy rather than talking about the content of a literate mind, a subject which can only divide us. I cited Jerome Bruner's theory of structure and promised to deal, in this follow-up article, with his notion of discovery.

Bruner writes about discovery in his book On Knowing, and prefaces his work on the act of discovery with a quote from Maimonides' Guide for the Perplexed. Maimonides decides that of the four forms of perfection – the acquisition of worldly goods, physical fitness, moral behaviour and intellectual discovery – the last is the highest form.

Bruner quotes Maimonides: "Examine the first three kinds of perfection; you will find that if you possess them, they are not your property, but the property of others… But the last kind of perfection is exclusively yours; no one else owns any part of it."

From this, Bruner projects that "if man's intellectual excellence is the most his own among his perfections, it is also the case that the most personal of all that he knows is that which he has discovered for himself."

Clearly, certain modes of teaching are more likely to result in self-discovery for the student. Any activity which is more interactive and which discourages student passivity will enable students to find answers on their own, rather than by being spoon-fed. Bruner tells us that there are major benefits that accrue from learning by discovery:

- an increase in intellectual potency;
- a shift from external motivation (grades, outside approval, etc.) to internal drives;
- a learning of how one reaches a discovery; and
- an improvement in memory conservation.

It is obvious, then, that the "how" of literacy is as important as the "what." In dealing with Jewish literacy, our schools must individually teach the content that is meaningful to their various ideologies, but all of them can benefit from Bruner's notions of structure and discovery to enhance the learning process.

The courageous and the brave

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

I once lived on Sultana Avenue. My roommate was Yossi Saperman, now the renowned and highly creative rabbi at Beth Torah Congregation. We never really got to know the older couple who lived near us – mostly because they didn't seem to want to know us. The two seemed to be somewhat angry. This was not peculiar, however, as they had grown up in eastern Europe in a time we are all angry about.

Time passed and as God wills, our older neighbour, the husband, passed away. Yossi and I felt it was proper we pay our respects and so we dropped into the shivah. What followed is something I will always remember, something that taught me an important lesson in life.

The two of us sat with the bereaved wife and she told us the story of her husband, the man we had thought was simply a curmudgeon. Tearing up, the mournful woman talked about how her spouse had smuggled guns into Israel from Czechoslovakia in 1948, to help our homeland build its arsenal for its war against its enemy. She said her lifelong partner had also worked with the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, the Jewish world's oldest and most revered humanitarian organization, assisting in the rescue of eastern European Jewry.

This man, the one who would look askance when I would mow the lawn or Yossi was fixing a bike (bike repair and sales was his career prior to joining the rabbinate), was in fact a Jewish hero who had been willing to sacrifice his life, if need be, for the Jewish people.

The lesson I learned from our shtilla (quiet) neighbourhood hero was that bravery is all around us. As the founding director of Ve'ahavta: The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian & Relief Committee, I am forever thankful I had the chance to meet bravery on Sultana, and that it so frequently walks through the front door of our offices, sometimes in the guise of a homeless person pushing hard to survive, other times within the body and soul of little people who aggressively insist of their parents that their family travel the streets to feed and clothe the weakest among us.

Bravery. Courage. The words are synonymous with fearless, intrepid, bold, audacious, valorous, mettlesome, plucky, dauntless and undaunted. Herman Melville, the great American novelist, wrote, "Familiarity with danger makes a brave man braver."

On Thursday, Nov. 20, Ve'ahavta will pay homage to the brave at our fifth annual Starry Knights gala. We are very excited because the evening will allow us to highlight the valiant and intrepid activities of five men and women and encourage others to act in a similar fashion to enhance our world. The man who will honour this select group of people is Eli Wiesel, a courageous Jew, a Nobel Prize winner and a voice of the Holocaust.

I wonder if you could lend us a hand by nominating a brave person you are familiar with. Consider someone who:

- Saved a life from persecution or a dangerous environment;
- Stood up against authority to ensure justice for another person or community;
- Rebuilt his/her life after the Holocaust, a war, etc.;
- Established a program/ organization/ entity against all odds, to assist people in need (for example, saved orphans);
- Challenged his/her environment to strengthen his/her culture or religion (for example, a local rabbi who launched an alternative synagogue).

E-mail me at avrum@veahavta.org with your nomination, stating the individual's name and why you feel this person should be honoured. If we decide to honour the person you nominate, you will be our guest at Starry Knights.

Bravery and courage is everywhere. Knock on your neighbour's door and you might discover one such person lives next to you simply plucking weeds from his/her garden.

Arab League to make historic visit to Israel

JTA

CAIRO — For the first time in its history, the Arab League will send a delegation to Israel.

This week's delegation, to be led by Egyptian and Jordanian officials, will discuss the threat posed by Hamas and Islamic extremism as well as the 22-nation league's peace proposal, which offers full Arab recognition of Israel in exchange for Israel's full withdrawal from lands captured in the 1967 Six-Day War, repatriation of Palestinian refugees and the creation of a Palestinian state.

"This is the first time the Arab League is coming to Israel," Israeli Foreign Ministry spokesperson Mark Regev said, according to the Associated Press. "From its inception, the Arab League has been hostile to Israel. It will be the first time we'll be flying the Arab League flag."

The growing power of Islamic extremists in the Middle East, underscored by Hamas' violent takeover of Gaza last month, has drawn the fortunes of Israel and the league's members closer together.

Arab League Secretary General Amr Moussa said Sunday that "the upcoming visit of Egypt's and Jordan's foreign ministers to Israel upon the request of the Arab committee of peace initiative is to conduct necessary contacts with Israel," AP reported.

Ottawa unveils security assistance

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The federal government is making $3 million in security funding available for communities that have been "historic victims" of hate crimes in Canada, Stockwell Day, minister for public safety, announced at a July 5 press conference at RCMP headquarters in Montreal.

Stockwell Day

The Security Infrastructure Pilot program will be available to non-profit and other provincially recognized community organizations that want to augment their existing security infrastructure.

Recalling the recent history of firebombings of Montreal Jewish and Muslim day schools, and the vandalization of native schools, Day pledged the money to allow faith communities "the freedom to live and congregate without fear" across Canada.

"Sometimes these crimes are reported as 'victimless' because nobody was hurt… but there is harm," Day said. "Look into the eyes of [the schoolchildren] who say 'Why us? What did we do to deserve this?' The funds being made available will help dissuade perpetrators… from [committing] these crimes."

According to Day's ministry, the program's funds will help cover the costs of minor security enhancements such as alarm systems, closed-circuit televisions, intercoms and inspection equipment that can be outfitted to "places of worship clearly linked to a community with a demonstrated history of being victimized by hate-motivated crime."

Ross' Killer Jailed

TORONTO — The man convicted of second-degree murder after admitting to killing Alicia Ross in August 2005 was sentenced to 16 years in jail without parole last week. The Crown had asked that Daniel Sylvester, 33, get 15 to 18 years, while his lawyer sought 10 to 12. Second-degree murder carries a minimum 10 years in jail without parole. Sylvester, who lived next door to Ross, pleaded guilty to manslaughter, but the Crown rejected his plea.

CJC Rejects Group

MONTREAL — A Jewish group opposed to Israel's occupation of the West Bank and Gaza criticized Canadian Jewish Congress last week for reaffirming an earlier decision to bar it from becoming a member of the national organization. In a letter to the Alliance of Concerned Jewish Canadians, the CJC said it decided last month not to reverse its August 2006 decision because the group's aims conflict with those of Congress, the Montreal Gazette reported. One example cited was the alliance's support for a call by an Ontario union to boycott Israel. A spokesperson for the alliance, which says it has 115 members, said the CJC move is a "futile attempt to marginalize growing Jewish opposition to Israel's behaviour and to the exclusive character of the Israeli state."

Order Adds Jews

OTTAWA — Five Jews were named to or promoted within the Order of Canada late last month. Barney Danson of Toronto, a Liberal MP and defence minister under prime minister Pierre Trudeau, was promoted to companion within the order, its highest rank, while Ottawa engineer Leon Katz was promoted to the rank of officer. Named as members of the order were Montreal author Muriel Gold, Toronto educator Lola Rasminsky and Toronto writer Leon Rooke.

WORLD

Jewish Soldier Buried

FORT LAUDERDALE — More than 1,000 mourners attended the June 26 funeral of a Jewish soldier from South Florida who was killed in Iraq. U.S. Army Specialist Daniel Agami, 25, affectionately known as "G.I. Jew," was killed in Baghdad on June 21 when an explosive device detonated near his vehicle. He was buried with full military honours and awarded the Purple Heart, the Bronze Star and the Army Commendation Medal. Agami graduated from the Hebrew Academy Community School in Margate, Fla. Its dean said at the funeral that Agami kept kosher while in the army and slept with a U.S. and Israeli flag over his bunk. The school set up a scholarship fund in his name.

Opera Diva Was Born to Immigrant Parents

NEW YORK — Beverly Sills, the premier American opera diva, died July 2 at her Manhattan home of inoperable lung cancer. She was 78.

Beverly Sills

Sills was born Belle Silverman in the Crown Heights area of Brooklyn. Her father was an insurance broker from Romania, and her mother was born in Russia. Sills was pushed into show business at age four, her mother believing her to be a "Jewish Shirley Temple," the New York Times reported.

In her career with the New York City Opera, she won critical praise for portraying Cleopatra in Handel's Giulio Cesare and Lucia in Donizetti's Lucia di Lammermoor.

Sills retired from the stage at 50 and assumed the general director's post of the City Opera. With the company $3 million (US) in debt, Sills put her fundraising skills to work, and by the time she stepped down in 1989, the opera had slashed ticket prices by 20 per cent and had a $3 million surplus.

Sills later moved to the Lincoln Center of the Performing Arts, where in 1994 she was elected chairwoman of the board. In 2002, she became chairwoman of the Metropolitan Opera.

Renewal Retreat

ALBUQUERQUE — The Jewish Renewal movement held a "sacred community" gathering last week in Albuquerque, N.M. About 700 Jewish Renewal practitioners came to pray, study and create "sacred community" in the 13th biannual Aleph Kallah, an international gathering hosted by Aleph: The Alliance for Jewish Renewal. Only 43 of the nearly 700 participants were non-American, hailing from a handful of other countries. There are 140 members of the Renewal rabbinic association, Ohalah, and 115 candidates in Aleph's training program for rabbis, cantors and rabbinic pastors.

Israeli Chairs At UN

NEW YORK — The United Nations wrapped up its first conference chaired by an Israeli. The Committee on Program and Co-ordination, which monitors the agenda and achievements of every UN agency, concluded its annual meeting July 3. Ron Adam, the Israeli Foreign Ministry's director for UN political affairs and a former official at Israel's UN mission, chaired the committee, a first for an Israeli. "It's a small step for the UN, but it's a big step for Israel in the UN," Adam told JTA. He said several Muslim states took part without incident, including Indonesia and Algeria. Iran's representative attended, but did not take part. It was the latest diplomatic achievement for Israel at the UN owing to its admission in May 2000 into the Western European and Other States regional grouping. In 2005, Ambassador Dan Gillerman served as a vice-president of the General Assembly, the first time an Israeli had done so since Abba Eban in 1952.

Capital Gets Mikvah

MELBOURNE — The small Jewish community in Australia's capital is building a mikvah after a Chabad Lubavitch rabbi from Melbourne pledged to fund Canberra's first Jewish ritual bath. Some 600 Jews live in Canberra, whose lay-led community has no rabbi or kosher butcher. Orthodox and liberal Jews share prayer facilities at a Jewish centre.

Organizations urge action on education funding

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

With the Ontario provincial election set for Oct. 10 and the issue of public funding for faith-based schools in the public eye, the Jewish community is at a crossroads, according to Josh Cooper, executive director of Canadian Jewish Political Affairs Committee (CJPAC).

Cooper, speaking last week at a Jewish community meeting on inclusive public education, told some 350 audience members that, "for real changes to occur, our concerns, our ideas, and our passion must be felt by our elected officials at Queen's Park and those who seek elected office."

The July 4 meeting, held at the Leah Posluns Theatre, was co-sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) Ontario region, the Ontario Association of Jewish Day Schools and CJPAC.

Cooper urged audience members to "let [Tory leader] John Tory and PC candidates know that you appreciate his leadership on this issue and are willing to help."

Last month, the Conservative party unveiled an election promise to bring faith-based schools into the public school system and to inject $800 million in new funding into the system.

Cooper also urged Liberal and NDP supporters to inform their candidates that their parties "need to consider moving to support of or, at least, away from outright opposition to inclusive public education."

He said that candidates need to hear that "not only you, but your family, and your community, consider [school funding] a critical issue determining how you will vote this October."

Josh Cooper

CJPAC can offer "tools to ensure your voice is heard," Cooper said. He urged the audience to volunteer for candidates, call talk radio shows, write letters to newspapers, involve friends and family, and – most importantly – to vote.

Inclusive public education, among other things, would increase contact between students and teachers at faith-based and non-faith-based schools, ensure greater accountability by faith-based schools for what they teach, and "allow Ontario's public education system to reflect the diversity of the 21st century," said David Koschitzky, speaking on behalf of the sponsoring organizations.

It would also bring Ontario into line with other provinces that provide funding to faith-based schools, he noted.

Brenda Dzaldov, a public school teacher and mother of three Jewish day school students, said she is "completely dedicated" to public education, but added that day school "allows my kids to absorb Jewish heritage and values as a natural element of the normal school day."

The opportunity to do so enriches their lives and will help them contribute to society in the future, she said.

Dzaldov said there are many public education programs, including professional development, that would benefit Jewish day schools if they were to come under the public education umbrella.

Concerns raised in a question-and-answer session included whether funding faith-based schools would create breeding grounds for extremism, and whether the change would mean that non-Jewish children would have to be admitted to Jewish schools.

Koschitzky said that not funding faith-based schools could foster extremism, because there is a need to ensure that schools teach ideals such as tolerance and democracy.

Steven Shulman, regional director and general counsel of CJC's Ontario region, said that if Jewish schools take public money, there will very likely be "open enrolment, period, or an element of open enrolment."

He suggested that non-Jewish students who study in Jewish schools might serve as "ambassadors for the Jewish people… We shouldn't be frightened by this."

Israel must go slow

From the editor's desk

The pressure mounts on Israel from all sides of the diplomatic ocean to offer "gestures" of support that will prop up the regime of Palestinian Authority president, Mahmoud Abbas, among Palestinians in the West Bank and in Gaza.

Since Abbas' Fatah party and its supporters were routed in fierce, brutal fighting and expelled from Gaza by the armed forces of Hamas last month, western governments and western-oriented governments in the Arab world have been pre-occupied with devising strategies that ensure the survival of the PA president.

Last Wednesday, for example, it was the turn of the government of France to give Israel indispensible advice.

"It's at this moment that we feel – that all the observers feel – there is a need to make a gesture," French Foreign Minister Bernard Kouchner told reporters after meeting in Paris with his Israeli counterpart, Tzipi Livni.

"It's often Israel that makes the gestures – I know that; we know that," he said. "It's once again Israel's turn to start this momentum that will become unstoppable because the two populations want peace."

According to Ha'aretz, French President Nicolas Sarkozy also pressed that very same message in a telephone call the day before to Israeli Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, telling him that Israel must absolutely aid Abbas to take initiatives.

As Kouchner astutely pointed out, all of the prop-up-Abbas strategies are predicated upon Israeli concessions.

In truth, and it seems, as always, Israel is in a precarious situation. Islamic radical forces, actively supported by Iran, Syria and perhaps even Al Qaeda, rule Gaza. They must not be allowed to gain a foothold, let alone control, in the West Bank as well. Moreover, they represent as much of a threat to Jordan and Egypt as they do to Israel.

Thus, in the immediate aftermath of Hamas' takeover of Gaza, a four-way leaders' summit – with significant behind-the scenes western watching, and probably planning – was quickly cobbled together at Sharm el Sheikh.

Egypt's Hosni Mubarak, Jordan's King Abdullah, Olmert and Abbas met to discuss the newly troubled and troubling situation.

What emerged, essentially, was a common reiteration of the urgency of the hour and the desirability of a plan – by Israel – to implement a series of goodwill gestures toward the Palestinians, who, presumably, in their unschooled, untrained, naive gratitude, will attribute the myriad benefits that flow from these gestures to the clear-eyed, hard-nosed, steel-backed, resolute will and wisdom of their president.

As reported by JTA, Olmert did indeed come forward with those golden gestures. He promised to release 250 Fatah members from Israeli jails who 'do not have blood on their hands' and to transfer some $700 million (US) of Palestinian Authority tax revenues collected by Israel but withheld since Hamas won PA legislative elections in January 2006. He also said he would continue to allow humanitarian aid to reach Gaza.

Since then, half of the withheld taxes has been scheduled for release by Israel on condition that the money does not reach Hamas. Indeed as a result of the release of those funds and additional funding from the West, last Wednesday, for the first time in 15 months, Palestinian Authority workers, excluding some 19,000 who report to Hamas, received their first full set of wages.

On Sunday, the Israeli cabinet agreed to release approximately 250 Palestinian prisoners and detainees, in keeping with the criteria that have been determined in previous cabinet decisions, with the proviso that prisoners who have served less than two-thirds of their sentences will not be released.

Nor has there been any miserliness on Israel's part in distributing humanitarian aid to the people of Gaza. As of last Wednesday, approximately 423 tons of animal feed, 505 tons of straw, 321 tons of sugar, 354 tons of flour, 74 tons of salt, 28 tons of spices, 28 tons of pasta, 14 tons of canned food, 29 tons of tomato sauce, 26 tons of fine flour, 24 tons of tuna, 27 tons of peanuts, 14 tons of jam, 13 tons of cooking oil, seven tons of hyssop, 22 tons of canned full, seven tons of raspberry juice powder were delivered to Gazans through the Sufa Crossing. A further 22 tons of medicine and powdered milk, 40 tons of frozen meat, 66 tons of dairy products, 59 tons of meat, 5 tons of fertilized eggs, 115 tons of fruit, 42 tons of bananas, two truckloads of disposable diapers and three truckloads of medicine and medical equipment had been delivered through the Kerem Shalom crossing.

The fulfilment of the Sharm el Sheikh pledges notwithstanding, many observers are urging Israel not to fall into lockstep with the western campaign to prop up Abbas.

In a tightly argued, insightful article in the Wall Street Journal June 20, Israeli political analyst Michael Oren wrote: "Clearly no progress toward Palestinian statehood can be made before Fatah has reformed itself financially, ideologically and structurally. Even under the most propitious circumstances this process is certain to take many years - longer if economic aid and political support are provided to the PA unconditionally." To understate the matter profoundly, the Palestinian situation is murky. In these unclear circumstances, Israel must go slow.

Decision soon on Holy Blossom renovation plan

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Members of Holy Blossom Temple will finish casting their votes next Monday on a controversial renovation plan that would reverse the direction of the 1,100-seat sanctuary.

A group that opposes the proposed change – the Holy Blossom Temple Sanctuary Legacy Group (saveoursanctuary.com) – has been contacting other temple members to gain support.

Spokesperson Michael Marrus, a University of Toronto history professor, says the group has the support of hundreds of members.

Re-orienting the sanctuary in the 69-year-old Bathurst Street building would mean that worshippers would face eastward toward Jerusalem, as in more traditional synagogues. It would also mean that worshippers would turn their backs on the temple's majestic domed apse, which now houses the ark. The current back end of the sanctuary, which would become the front, features a stained-glass rose window, also an impressive feature.

In fact, the orientation of the sanctuary wasn't even considered when renovation plans were first explored, according to both Rabbi John Moscowitz, senior rabbi of the 2,200-member, 150-year-old congregation, and Cary Solomon, head of the temple's building transformation committee.

Initially, a more pressing concern was to create a better space for the congregation to come together outside of worship services – for a kiddush, for example. "We were much more concerned with how you bring together a community physically, and therefore emotionally," the rabbi said.

The synagogue has not undergone a major renovation since the 1960s, when the Leo Baeck Day School was added.

The renovation, which is expected to cost $35 million and which would begin in fall 2008 at the earliest, would include a three-storey central atrium that would serve as a gathering space and entry to other parts of the building; a new social hall with offices above it, and an underground parking lot that would increase available parking spaces by about 15 to 20 per cent, said Solomon. The lot would have an elevator to the atrium.

A renovation of the Leo Baeck Day School facilities housed in the synagogue is also part of the plan. The school would contribute $15 million toward renovation costs, and more than $13 million has been raised by the congregation, said Solomon.

Body of missing boater recovered

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Police in North Bay have recovered the body of Eli Horowitz, the 30-year-old Toronto man who went missing last August while boating on Lake Nipissing.

The body was discovered on the lake July 3 when three fisherman from the Dunnville, Ont., area spotted a floating body, Ontario Provincial Police Sgt. Joe Strba said.

"The body was floating at the time but to our knowledge, the body had only been up floating for only a short period of time, because a lot of damage is done once it's afloat… and none of that was found," Strba said.

An autopsy was performed in Toronto the following day and Horowitz's identity was confirmed using dental records.

Horowitz and his father-in-law, Heine Mondrowitz, 56, were vacationing near North Bay with family and decided to rent a 19-foot boat to go fishing. When the empty vessel drifted ashore on Aug. 21, an extensive land, air and water search began.

Mondrowitz's body was recovered a few days after the incident, but Horowitz remained missing until last week.

Due to persistent effort by Hatzoloh Toronto, a volunteer emergency medical service for the Orthodox community that Horowitz helped establish in Toronto, the search extended into September.

"We did our own thing and they did their own thing under guidance from us," Strba said. "They certainly were helpful in getting volunteers to be able to extend the search into bigger areas in a shorter period of time. Once that was over, we just kind of did our normal thing. We'd received tips last winter [about body sightings]. We followed all those up and they were negative."

Mendel Friedman, executive director of Hatzoloh Toronto, said he made sure to keep police focused on recovering Horowitz, who was a Hatzoloh volunteer and one of the paramedics who responded to the murder of David Rosensweig at Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue about five years ago.

"It was Hatzoloh's mandate to be in touch with [police] at least once a week. We didn't go up there since the beginning of last winter, but we always were calling Strba to make sure that they get choppers circling the shores when they have one available. We were always pushing them for help, and thank God that it worked out," Friedman said.

Interestingly, Friedman said, July 3 was a fast day to mourn the breaching of Jerusalem's walls, and 10 rabbis from Toronto headed up to North Bay to pray over the water where Horowitz went missing.

"They left at like 10:30 a.m. An hour, or two hours into their travelling, we got the call that the body was found," he said.

"It was just fortuitous that it all happened on this day, because they were able to be right here when we brought the body back," Strba added.

Friedman said that once a rabbi confirmed it was Horowitz's body, he made sure the family was taken care of with proper medical attention, and then he made the announcement.

Horowitz was buried at Pardes Shalom Cemetery on July 4.

"It is a bittersweet situation here, because it is unfortunate that a person died, but it is sweet to hear that after so much effort, money, time and energy and manpower that went into this search, against all the odds, that he [was found]," Friedman said.

Added Strba: "It is a very good feeling for us to be able to get this done and finished. We can imagine, having been told about the Jewish law… regarding remarrying Shevi [Horowitz's widow], how important it was to them."

Friedman said he had yet to contact the fishermen who discovered Horowitz's body, but is making arrangements to follow through with giving them a $10,000 reward.

Proposal would re-orient sanctuary of historic shul

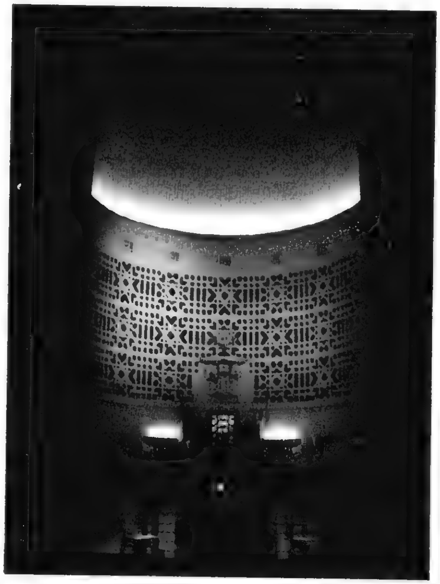
It was daunting to come up with a plan that would transform the building into "something that hopefully will be valid 70 years from today," said Solomon, a real estate developer. "It's a very important building, architecturally and iconically."

After considering 48 proposals, the committee settled on a plan by architect Jack Diamond, which it recommended to the temple's board of directors. The plan was presented to congregants in a series of town hall meetings that began in February.

Explaining the rationale for reorienting the sanctuary, Rabbi Moscowitz said that "great spaces should be entered from the back." To leave the sanctuary as it is, congregants would enter through doors at the front of the sanctuary, on either side of the bimah.

Ironically, that is how the sanctuary is entered now, for the most part. Other than the High Holy Days and a few other occasions, the double wooden doors outside the back of the sanctuary, which exit onto Bathurst Street, are locked for security reasons.

The rabbi doesn't believe that the temple would lose historical value by reorienting the sanctuary. "The sanctuary will remain essentially the same. It will have the same walls, the same windows, the same apse, the Bathurst Street doors, the same seats, and probably better lighting and a better mix of heating and air conditioning. In fact, one of the other charges to the architect was to help us think about the future while at the same time we don't forget the past."



Since it was built in 1938, worshippers in the sanctuary at Holy Blossom Temple have faced a domed apse.

[Frances Kraft photo]

He added that several firms suggested making the sanctuary into the social hall, an idea that was rejected.

Plans for the Bathurst Street doors and the apse – significant issues for the opposing group – were modified at the beginning of June, said Solomon. The original plan called for the doors to be used as exits only, and for a balcony to be added half-way up the apse.

Legacy group members support most other aspects of the renovation but believe the sanctuary is "a magnificent example of synagogue architecture" that should not be reoriented, said Marrus. The group claims there are also structural reasons to keep the sanctuary as it is, and it has undertaken its own "preliminary engineering and cost evaluation" of the new design.

Marrus said the congregation was not told that the floor of the sanctuary slopes about 18 inches down from the Bathurst St. end toward the current bimah and apse. "It's a gentle slope going downward to enable people to see better. If you turn the sanctuary around, guess what? You've got to slope it the other way. This means you have to raise the floor not only the 18 inches, but another 18 inches. That means everything is thrown out of kilter – the windows, the pillars, everything has to be changed. This will cost millions of dollars."

Solomon told The CJN, however, that Diamond's plan calls for the floor to be "flattened out," not sloped in the other direction, and that the extra expense Marrus is referring to is unnecessary.

"I think it's important to stress there's been a lot of hard feeling around [the issue of reorienting the sanctuary] and even some stigmatizing of both sides, and I deplore this, no matter which side it's on," Marrus said. "People ought to be able to respect each other and disagree amongst themselves without personalizing the issue and without unnecessarily dividing people. Our experience has been that our opposition has taken [our point of view] as disloyalty to the congregation and to Israel." (Some supporters of the renovation plan have argued that it will show support for Israel at a time when the state's existence is being challenged.)

Solomon said the pro-renovation side has "tried to do the best we can to address their major issues." He believes that not reorienting the sanctuary would result in a "suboptimal design from a functional standpoint.

"Hopefully we've extended the feeling that we're listening and that we've done something."

Cynical, ghoulish theatre

The irony of the scene – as surreal as it was celebratory – was not lost on anyone who has even the mildest respect, let alone reverence, for the value of human life. Last Wednesday, British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) reporter Alan Johnston was freed, after 114 days, from the clutches of his kidnappers, the shadowy, malevolent group of Palestinian thugs who call themselves the Army of Islam. Hamas engineered his release from the Gaza City hideout in which he was imprisoned.

In the euphoric release of his freedom, Johnston told a press conference in Jerusalem: "I'm pretty sure that if Hamas hadn't come in and turned the heat on, I'd still be in that room. Hamas has a huge law and order agenda."

In those few, carefully chosen words, the newly freed journalist painted his rescue in cheery colours of determined, civic responsibility on the part of the Hamas rulers of Gaza, who – it was important he tell the rest of the world – are misunderstood proponents of the rule of law.

Johnston's reportraiture of Hamas was immediately accepted by significant groups in his home, the United Kingdom. The day after his release, 20 British members of Parliament from across the political spectrum called for talks with Hamas. Even the foreign secretary, David Miliband, "fully acknowledged the crucial role" played by Hamas in freeing Johnston.

But most seasoned observers of Palestinian society, and certainly most Palestinians themselves, know better.

Johnston's release was cynically and ghoulishly choreographed theatre. The Hamas leaders knew at all times where Johnston was being held. They chose the hour of his release because they were complicit in his captivity.

Yasser Abed Rabbo, a senior aide to Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas, aptly called Johnston's release nothing more than propaganda-scoring theatre by two actors, Hamas and the Army of Islam, who know each other and act together quite well.

"We're watching a movie, where the thieves in Gaza fall out and one of them claims to be honest and brave, and the other is the bad guy. This Hamas game fools no one," Rabbo said.

In the celebration of Johnston's release, it should be remembered that Israel Defence Forces soldier Cpl. Gilad Shalit was kidnapped more than 380 days ago by Hamas and the very same Army of Islam that kidnapped Alan Johnston. Indeed, only two weeks ago, on the anniversary of his kidnapping, Hamas played a voice recording of the young Shalit.

While the fanfare trumpets in the United Kingdom and other places ceremoniously sounded Hamas' virtue, members of Shalit's family and the families of Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser were in Europe pleading with Red Cross officials and political leaders to help secure the release of their loved ones from Hamas and, it must be added, Hezbollah captivity.

"Law and order" is a breathtakingly perverse phrase to describe the closely watched, totalitarian control that the Hamas rulers impose on the people in Gaza. The place is bereft of all freedoms except those that fit within the Islamic rulers' extremist religious program. And now, the much vaunted law and order label that Ismail Haniyeh wears on the lapel of his two-piece suit like a shiny, polished sheriff's badge distracts Westerners from remembering his movement's single ideological purpose: the elimination of the Jewish state.

Terrorists in the medical profession

In a crude attempt to take the blame away from Islamic terrorists, we have been told that they are illiterate, ignorant, disenfranchised and frustrated youths and that they become suicide bombers because of their lack of education and frustration of living in poverty. Now comes the revelation that the latest terrorist suspects allegedly responsible for the recent events in London and Scotland are highly educated doctors and interns. Their motivation is clearly not to convert non-Muslims to Islam, but rather to murder and destroy innocent civilians as an example of jihad bent on destroying western civilization. If such lunatics have entered the medical profession, what's next – the police force, the army or even government? All lawful steps must be taken to eliminate this evil cancer that is festering in western civilization.

Some religions more equal than others

We tell new immigrants that all religions are treated equally in Canada. It seems, however, that in Ontario, some religions are more equal than others ("Families sue for disabled funding in faith schools," CJN, July 5). As a result, the Liberal government funds children with disabilities in Catholic schools, but not all disabled children in the Hebrew day schools. Attorney General Michael Bryant could have resolved the issue with the parents of the disabled children. Instead, it is unfortunate that he has chosen to spend the government's money on deploying his battery of government lawyers against the parents, rather than spending it on the children who need the assistance.

Gov't violating disabled children's rights

When our provincial government chooses to fund support for some disabilities to children in private faith-based schools and not others, while providing those services to public and Catholic school children, it is clearly violating children's constitutional rights ("Families sue for disabled funding in faith schools," CJN, July 5).

It is in the best interest of society to ensure that all disabled children receive those services that they so need to reach their full potential. Obtaining these services can mean the difference between flunking out of high school or obtaining a graduate degree in university. How could the provincial government treat our children with such inequity, something any other province would be ashamed to do?

It is time for the province to declare that it is in favour of funding without discrimination and to ensure that these children have what they need and what they are entitled to in order to reach their potential.

Services for developmentally challenged

I was very glad to see the coverage of Reena in The CJN (UJA Federation Jewish Toronto stories, June 28). Reena is a wonderful organization providing excellent services to many individuals with developmental disabilities.

My daughter is a Reena Outreach client. She has had a particularly difficult year, which has created severe stress for her and us, her parents. Social work, outreach and respite staff have provided us with caring and practical support that has got us through this difficult time.

As our daughter approaches the end of her education, worries about the availability of services keep us up at night. The services for adults are grossly insufficient for the thousands of developmentally challenged individuals needing them.

Israel supported apartheid regime

In the column "South Africa damns Israel" (CJN, June 28), Lawrence Hart describes the animus of the current South African regime, dominated by the African National Congress, against Israel. This negative attitude toward Israel seems almost inexplicable, according to Hart. It's presented as an unprovoked attack. Hart's column would have been more balanced, and his readers better served, had he devoted a sentence or two to Israel's long-standing support, military and otherwise, of the previous apartheid regime, which brutally suppressed the ANC and many South Africans. Not all opposition to Israel is motivated solely by pure anti-Semitism. South Africans in particular are sensitive to apartheid and those who support it.

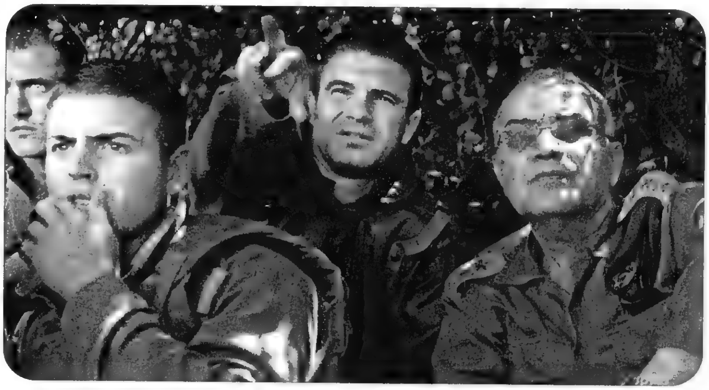
Lebanon war one year later: Was it Israel's wake-up call?

By LESLIE SUSSER
JTA

One year after the Second Lebanon War, Israel's northern front is quiet, UN forces are patrolling the border area and Hezbollah fighters have been pushed back deep inside Lebanese territory.

That's the good news.

On the other side of the equation, Prime Minister Ehud Olmert is still under pressure to resign for his poor conduct of the war, home-front defences are suffering from neglect, Hezbollah is re-arming with bigger and better rockets, and there has been no sign of life from the two abducted Israeli soldiers whose abduction on July 12, 2006, sparked the 34-day conflict.



Former chief of staff Dan Halutz, right, observes a military operation from the field.
[Israel Sun photos]

One year later, these questions remain: How has Israel's performance in the war affected its standing in a hostile environment? Is UN Security Council Resolution 1701, which brought the fighting to an end, proving effective? What are the chances of a prisoner exchange? What has been done to bring the Israel Defence Forces up to speed and to bolster home defences? And on the political front, can Olmert survive as prime minister?

In the fighting, 119 soldiers and 44 civilians were killed. Israeli forces proved unable to stop daily Hezbollah rocket barrages on civilian population centres, national leadership was indecisive, ground troops did not perform well and the captured soldiers, Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser, were not freed.

Most experts maintain that on balance, the war hurt Israel's deterrent capacity. The problem is particularly acute on the Syrian front, where President Bashar Assad has been building up his arsenal of ground-to-ground, anti-aircraft and anti-tank missiles.

The Israeli concern is that Assad, given his perception of the Israeli performance in Lebanon, may miscalculate his military strength relative to Israel's and start hostilities. In recent months, the Israeli government has sent Assad two clear messages: Israel has no intention of attacking Syria, and if war does break out, Syria would be far more vulnerable to Israeli firepower than Hezbollah because of its state apparatus and infrastructure.

Israeli intelligence believes the messages were received, but no one on the Israeli side is discounting the possibility of another war in the north this summer.

In the immediate aftermath of last year's war, Olmert presented UN Resolution 1701 as a major strategic gain. It placed a "robust" UN force of more than 13,000 troops in the border area previously occupied by Hezbollah, creating an effective buffer between Israel and the Shiite militiamen.

Indeed, in the year since the war, Hezbollah has not fired a single shot across the border. An isolated rocket attack on Kiryat Shmonah in mid-June was attributed to a radical Palestinian faction. Hezbollah fortifications near the border have been destroyed, and arms and ammunition found there have been confiscated.

Olmert says the days are gone when Hezbollah forces near the border, with more than 10,000 Katyusha rockets trained on civilian, military and strategic targets, could hold Israel captive.

A late June report released by UN Secretary General Ban Ki-moon, however, paints a more sombre picture. According to Ban, Hezbollah continues to receive vast quantities of arms from Syria and Iran, in blatant violation of 1701.

Haifa Mayor Yona Yahav surveys damage to his city.

Most of the weaponry comes overland across the Syria-Lebanon border and includes rockets with a range of more than 150 miles. Hezbollah, according to the report, is apparently building new positions outside the UN zone from which it would be able to launch rocket attacks against Israel. Israel has complained several times about the porous nature of the Syria-Lebanon border, but no one seems to be doing anything about it.

Israel also is concerned about the possible military co-ordination among Iran, Syria and Hezbollah. For example, if Assad were to launch hostilities later in the summer, Israeli intelligence believes Hezbollah would join in, and Iran would provide more weapons and logistical support.

Ban's report on the fate of the two Israeli captives is equally downbeat. He is sharply critical of Hezbollah for not providing any sign of life from the two soldiers and says concerns about their fate are growing.

Israeli officials believe that during the abduction, one of the men may have been badly wounded. Contacts between Israel and Hezbollah through a German intermediary are continuing, but nothing has been revealed about the soldiers' conditions. Bargaining over a prisoner exchange apparently has yet to get off the ground.

The most dramatic change since the war has occurred among Israel's military forces. Following the criticism of its performance, the army set up more than 40 internal panels to analyze shortcomings and recommend improvements.

As public protest swelled, chief of staff Dan Halutz, an air force man, resigned and was replaced by Gabi Ashkenazi, a seasoned infantry general. Ashkenazi introduced key changes in doctrine and training. The notion that modern wars could be won by firepower alone was replaced with the classic IDF doctrine of firepower and ground force manoeuvres combined.

Training of ground forces and reserves was increased significantly in light of the modified doctrine. In late May, the IDF carried out joint exercises on a scale not seen in years.

There also has been new thinking on home-front defences. Dan Meridor, a former minister for strategic affairs, recently produced a detailed report, The Home Front as Battlefield, in which he argues that in modern rocket warfare, civilians are as likely to find themselves on the front line as soldiers, and that it is incumbent on the government to prepare them psychologically and provide the funding for their protection.

Gaps in levels of security for rich and poor could harm national resilience, Meridor said. But there has been little government action on building new shelters, making old ones more habitable or providing funds for the construction of reinforced rooms in private homes and apartments.

The big political question in the wake of the war is whether Olmert can maintain his hold on power much longer. The Winograd Commission, the main panel investigating the overall conduct of the war, issued a scathing interim report in April that was particularly critical of the prime minister's performance.

By moving quickly to close ranks in his Kadima party, Olmert managed to survive. Pundits say, however, that if the committee is as scathing, or even more so, in its final report expected in August, the prime minister may have to go.

The Labour party under the new defence minister, Ehud Barak, is threatening to bring down the coalition government – of which Labour is a key element – if Olmert stays.

For Israel, the Second Lebanon War undoubtedly was a traumatic experience. But paradoxically, it may have served as a timely wake-up call for both the military and the politicians. As a result, regional perceptions notwithstanding, the country may have emerged stronger.

Trusting God

I think it was Elie Wiesel who said that a Jew can be with God, against God, but not without God. The same seems to be true of non-Jews. In an age when religious "with God" fundamentalism is spreading rapidly, anti-religious "against God" tracts are hitting bestseller lists.

Rabbi Dow Marmur in Toronto

But few seem to be without God. Those who insist that they are against God often concede, at times grudgingly, that they have not given up on God. For as hard as they try to argue that all there is to life is the brief episode between birth and death, they cannot free themselves from intimations of transcendence. They may attack religion as an illusion – as Freud taught them – but only rarely can they ignore God altogether.

As the attacks are often mounted by public intellectuals – books by Richard Dawkins and Christopher Hitchens are current bestsellers – some Jews with aspirations to sophistication tend to be duped. If they want Judaism, they say they want it served up without reference to God. Tales of anti-Semitism, analyses of Middle East politics and stories about prominent Jews are favorite substitutes.

When I came to Canada and spoke more about God than about what I read in newspapers, ostensibly well-meaning advisers from far and near urged me to change my approach, because, they said, it put people off Judaism. My own experience has been different. I know many women and men who respect and listen to those who testify to the presence of God in their lives, in Jewish history and in the world. They may not want philosophical arguments or polemical refutations, but they recognize the authenticity of religious testimony rooted in experience and founded on commitment to the welfare of human beings, God's creatures.

Those who refuse to listen and are taken in by fashionable anti-religious jibes say that they affirm humanity and practise secular ethics. Looking at regimes that made anti-religion their creed – such as Nazi Germany and the Bolshevik Soviet Union, both now mercifully dead, though not yet buried – it is impossible to see any humanism in either.

Having grown up in the shadow of both, I came to the conclusion long ago that as laborious as it is to affirm God, it is impossible to believe in humanity. Though much evil has been done in the name of religion by those who use it as a tool for their own ambitions, no less evil is being done by those who replace traditional faith with lofty refutations.

To me this is yet another indication that trusting God – I prefer "trust" (bitachon) to "belief," which sounds too dogmatic – is more realistic and true than faith in humans and their science.

Travelling: just do it

After six weeks of adventuring in jungles, deserts, savannahs and everything in between, I am finally home from my West African journey.

Now that I am resting comfortably at home enjoying the iPods, computers and high-definition televisions that we all take for granted, I am have a greater appreciation not for the luxurious, but for the basic: hot water, flush toilets and food choices that include more than just goat or beef stew (always a better choice than flavourless boiled yams).

Jonah Brotman in Ottawa

Backpackers are often told to be wary of culture shock when travelling to exotic locales. Deciphering strange languages (Ghana has more than 50 local dialects), consuming bland diets (such as balls of dough with heavy sauce) and understanding cultural norms (eat with your right hand, wipe with your left) can all cause confusion and a feelings of isolation.

Having travelled to Ghana for the past two summers, I was completely confident and experienced no feelings of culture shock at all this time around. As well, adjusting to the hot, dry conditions was not a problem.

Surprisingly, however, coming back to air-conditioned Canada was indeed a shock. Even the plane ride home caused sniffles and an illness that I have yet to recover from.

While the streets in Toronto may be cleaner, smoother and better lit, Ghana has a feeling of warmth and community even in its most hectic markets. In Canada, people just plug in and tune out. From headphones to cellphones, Canadians connect over great distances, but rarely with those immediately around them.

In Ghana, people live in the here and now. Meetings are arranged for three different times: now, soon and later. Hours on a clock mean less than a promise to arrive. And a promise is only a promise if the rains stay away and the bus is running. Living in Ghana forces you to be more dynamic and open-ended. For example, although they run on a schedule, buses will wait for hours until they fill up with people.

Over time, you learn to understand that nothing works, but everything always works out, because there is order in Ghana's chaos.

What may seem like a destructive blaze to a westerner simply turns out to be a community garbage disposal fire. Police checkpoints look intimidating, yet a simple bribe of 10,000 Cedis (equal to $1.25 Cdn) always smooths things over.

Even daily transactions such as purchasing eggs or bread, occur around street stalls. Women stand with young children at their side at these wooden stalls, which often do double duty as both family business and shelter.

I remember when a small boy once came asking for bread. Reaching his little hand up over the table, he felt around and eventually touched the hand of a girl and made the exchange. Bending their heads under the table, the two of them giggled and the six-year-old boy walked off with a smile. The girl then smiled gleefully, to her mother's scorn. While economic transactions between children are not the norm in Canada, children learn to survive from an early age in Ghana.

These realities of Ghana highlight the misconceptions of an impoverished and destitute Africa. The constant barrage of malnourished bodies and gloomy faces on our screens captures only "Africa the bad."

What we often fail to see is "Africa the good": the strength of community and family, the ingenuity in spite of poverty and an overall zest for life that's shown by all.

International travel, no matter what the destination, should not just be about sightseeing and sun-tanning.

Travel provides the rare opportunity for true cross-cultural exchange. Learning about other cultures and sharing your own way of life fosters deep understanding and brings meaning to the experience.

Unfortunately, or perhaps not, such experiences are rarely found in guidebooks or bought at souvenir stands. They can be found in unexpected, genuine moments when you find yourself crowded in a dingy shed with a hundred boisterous African kids watching the Champion's League final on a tiny television powered by the only generator in town.

These moments are why I travel: for the adventure and the unknown, for the experiences and the memories.

Next time you travel, heed the clichés: dig deeper, stray from the path, step outside your comfort zone.

Most importantly, don't talk about travelling, just do it. You'll thank me later.

The divine gift of laughter

Lately I have been thinking about what it means to laugh, and it's obvious that laughter comes in many different forms.

The most common form is the laughter that comes in response to a funny joke or occurrence. There is laughter that is a spontaneous eruption or explosion, often unexplained. There is also mocking laughter – laughing at someone or something – and there is laughing in jest, often referred to as "laughing with" someone. Finally, there is nervous laughter, which is a kind of defence mechanism, covering up feelings that lie beneath the laughter.

Mordechai Walfish in Halifax

In thinking about laughter, I have found Freud's book Jokes and Their Relation to the Unconscious to be quite illuminating. Freud tells us that like dreams, jokes express things that are not immediately obvious in their manifest content. There is a gap between the surface and the deep unconscious that lies beneath this surface.

Throughout the book, Freud is also at pains to maintain the difference between the joke and something comical. A person might happen upon something that he or she finds comical, such as someone tripping over a banana peel. The person may enjoy a good chuckle over this, but it's essentially a private happening.

A joke on the other hand, takes place from one person to another. It must be told to someone else, and Freud tells us that we have an undeniable urge to tell jokes to others and can't keep them locked up inside. In fact, Freud suggests that a joke doesn't actually originate within a given person, but takes place between people. It's the laughter of the one who hears the joke that makes it possible, and Freud is clear that any joke that doesn't elicit this explosive laughter can't actually be considered a joke.

For Freud, the pleasure of a joke comes with the laughter of the one who hears the joke. It's impossible for someone to laugh at his or her own joke. Why, then, would anyone bother to tell a joke if the pleasure only belongs to the other person? While Freud doesn't go so far as to say that the joke is a benevolent act by a person whose only concern is the pleasure of others, there does seem to be a gift-like quality to a joke. Laughter is given from one person to another, connecting people in an intimate manner.

It's interesting to think about Freud's insights on laughter in relation to the place of laughter in the story surrounding Isaac's birth in Breishit. The Torah tells us that both Abraham and Sarah laugh at the prospect of giving birth to a child at the age of 100 and 90 respectively. We read that Sarah is rebuked for laughing, while Abraham is not. What is the difference between their laughter?

According to Rashi, Abraham engages in joyful laughter, affirming God's gift, while Sarah laughs mockingly, degrading the gift. If we recall what Freud said – that the joke really expresses something other than its manifest content, we see then that according to Rashi, the same act (laughter) can be used to express different, not immediately obvious feelings.

According to Nachmanides, it's the private nature of Sarah's laughter that displays its mocking quality. We are told that Sarah laughs within herself, bekirbah. Laughing out loud is a shared act, while inner laughter can't help but be mocking. Here we see an interesting parallel with Freud's difference between a comic event and a joke. While a joke creates community with its laughter, a comic event is private, separating us from each other and creating the distance necessary for "laughing at."

But according to the text of the Torah, there is a shift in Sarah's laughter. Initially her laugh is bekirbah. But after she gives birth, her laughter is transformed into an infectious and inviting outpouring. As the Torah states, "And Sarah said: God has made laughter for me, so that all that hear will laugh with me."

It's obvious that Sarah is grateful for both the laughter and the gift of the child that comes along with it. This laughter allows her to commune with others and receive the gift of Isaac openly.

European cemetery restoration a complex project

Best of intentions can lead to disastrous results

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Gail Sussman is well aware that people have the best of intentions when they try to fix up old, neglected cemeteries.

The CJN this past spring reported on a Montreal soldier serving with a Canadian peacekeeping mission in Bosnia who has been helping to restore a cemetery in Jezero-Privilica, near the city of Bihac.

However, people like this "begin without understanding the complexity of such a project," Sussman lamented, "and how fragile, for instance, the markers are. The simplest thing can lead to disastrous results."

Sussman, a conservator by training, has worked with Israel Antiquities Authority, and then as senior education/technical adviser for the Ontario Ministry of Culture. She now operates Rimmonim Preservation Consultants, a Toronto-based firm that offers technical assistance for the preservation of heritage buildings, archeological sites and artifacts.

She specializes in designing and delivering training programs for the conservation of cemeteries, particularly those planning conservation projects in cemeteries in their ancestral villages in Europe.

"A lot of people are going to eastern Europe to research their ancestors or to reconnect with their past," she said. They get very emotional when they see a cemetery, which may be the burial site for family members, in disarray.

Krakow Cemetery [Barry Avrich photo]

Sussman understands that but notes that they simply don't know about problems with either conservation techniques or Halachah.

She encountered one problem when she was asked to review a project in the Ukraine. Someone had started to energetically clean up – with a weed whacker. That doesn't hurt the lawn, but if it bangs into a gravestone, which may be 500 years old, the stone could crack and break.

Weed killers, she said, are high in soluble salts. They migrate into the stone and cause it to explode.

Similarly, when people try to stabilize a marker with cement, that, too, is high in soluble salts and has the same effect as weed killers.

It may seem sensible to remove trees, either to clear the cemetery or to make room for a path. However, Sussman said, if these trees have tremendous roots, which many do, you can unwittingly change the water table. This causes shifts in the soil and in the area around the stone.

It is important, she said, to avoid using high-pressure sprays to clean graffiti off tombstones, as the spray pushes the dirt or paint, whatever is there, right into the stone.

"You use a clay product that is mixed with paint remover, applied to the stone,.and then covered with a plastic film. This process pulls the paint into the poultice

, leaving the stone clean without harming it."

Some erstwhile amateur restorers have decided to pour icy water over a very hot stone in an effort to make the lettering more visible, Sussman said. Instead, the process cracks the stone.

People don't realize there are halachic issues, too. For instance, if stones have been scattered throughout a nearby town, they can't simply be set up anywhere in the cemetery, as a marker can only be erected over the grave it refers to, she said.

What does one do if a secular building has been built over part of a cemetery? Can one move the contents of a grave to a safer spot? How do you avoid harming a grave when putting in a foundation?

These problems do not only exist in Europe, she pointed out. There are many older cemeteries in northern Ontario, for instance, some established by Jews involved in the fur trade. With the diminishing and aging Jewish populations in the area, those cemeteries, too, are in danger of neglect.

What has been happening, Sussman said, is that there are no controls over what North Americans in Europe do when they arrive and start fixing things up. Some enlist the help of local people, who themselves have no expertise in these matters, let alone necessarily having the warmest feelings toward Jews or Jewish memorials, then go home, leaving the locals to do the work unsupervised.

What is most important, she said, is to combine the expertise of conservators and halachic scholars and to go about preserving the Jewish heritage in an effective and empathetic way.

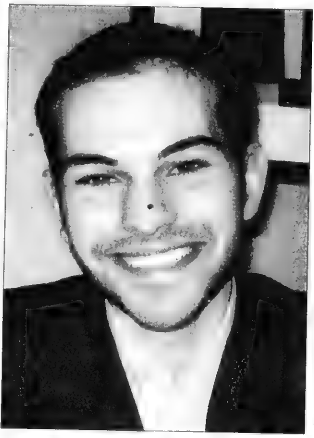
YU hits the road with kollel on wheels

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

The national director of Canadian operations of Yeshiva University is trying to put a different spin on kollels with a travelling six-week Torah learning program.

"The traditional form of a kollel is a room full of men who are sitting, learning and anyone is welcome to join, but mostly it is for their own purpose and they're enhancing their own learning," said Mo Lidsky, 24.

"I'm not particularly crazy about that kind of model, so I wanted to break down the walls a little bit and take it on wheels."



Mo Lidsky

The program, called Yeshiva University Summer Kollel (YUSK), is sponsored by YU's Center for the Jewish Future and YU's affiliated Rabbi Isaac Elchanan Theological Seminary (RIETS). It will take place every day until Aug. 15 at different shuls and camps in the Toronto area.

It will be led by Rabbi Shmuel Marcus, son of Rabbi Raphael Marcus of Toronto's Congregation Bnai Torah. The younger Rabbi Marcus is the rabbi at Kehilas Ishei Yisrael in New York and a professor in YU's Stone Beis Midrash Program.

Each weeknight, one of five Toronto-area synagogues will host the kollel, and Rabbi Shmuel Marcus will give a lecture while nine YU and RIETS students between the ages of 21 and 24 will lead study sessions.

Lidsky said the program will also be a learning experience for the rabbinical students, who are leading the sessions because they will have direct access to members of the community and will be able to hear from them what they expect from Jewish leaders and rabbis.

Examples of some of the lecture topics are "Confronting Modernity; Upholding Tradition," "The Parameters of Yichus: Paternity and Maternity in Reproductive Medicine," and "Jerusalem Through the Ages."

Lidsky said that although there are a many learning options in Toronto throughout the year, communal and formal education in the summer is lacking because programmers assume everyone goes away during that time.

"I don't know how true that is. I asked a whole bunch of people if they're going to be here… It's really just a week or two weeks at any given time that they're away, and for the rest of the summer, they're in town," he said.

As the young director of the organization, Lidsky decided to take matters into his own hands and create a summer program that he hopes will appeal to his generation.

"You have these rabbinical students, and they are very talented, knowledgeable, charismatic individuals who are looking to enhance themselves, but other people don't get the benefit of that. I thought, why don't we take it on the road?"

He said he made sure that the rabbinical students, who are receiving a stipend for their six weeks of service, would have time in the morning for their own personal learning, but in the afternoon, they're required to travel to camps, shuls and work with organizations to run formal education programs.

The evenings are reserved for seminars and what Lidsky calls a "Torah buffet," which is meant to tackle an assortment of topics on any given night.

"Let's say you're interested in mysticism and I'm interested in getting a crash course in Hebrew and someone else is interested in biblical interpretations and someone else is interested in Talmud. All of us have different interests, and rarely will we find lectures that speak to all of them."

The "Torah buffet" approach allows each of the nine rabbinical students to focus on one area of expertise every night and head a workshop in the hope that the variety of topics will cast a wide net in the young Jewish community.

The weekends are reserved for Shabbatons, in which participants will go to a dinner-and-dancing event and take part in various seminars.

Lidsky said the kollel is such an open concept that he doesn't even have a target market for it. He wants to make the service available to anyone who wants it.

"The kollel concept is well known in Orthodox circles, and they hear about it in Orthodox circles, and we certainly hope that people who are Conservative and Reform will join up as well."

'KOSHER' LABEL IN ADVERTISING

The Canadian Food Inspection Agency Guide to Food Labelling and Advertising

reads as follows:

"In the labelling, packaging and advertising of a food, the Food and Drug Regulations prohibits the use of the word kosher or any letter of the Hebrew alphabet, or any other word, expression, depiction, sign, symbol, mark, device or other representation that indicates or that is likely to create an impression that the food is kosher, if the food does not meet the requirements of the Kashruth applicable to it.

The terms "kosher style" and "kind of kosher" are not allowed, unless they meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish-style food" or "Jewish cuisine" are not objected to, although the foods may not necessarily meet the requirements of the Kashruth.

Rationale: "Kosher style" is considered to create the impression that the food is kosher, and therefore the food must meet the requirements of the Kashruth. "Jewish style" food may not necessarily create this impression."

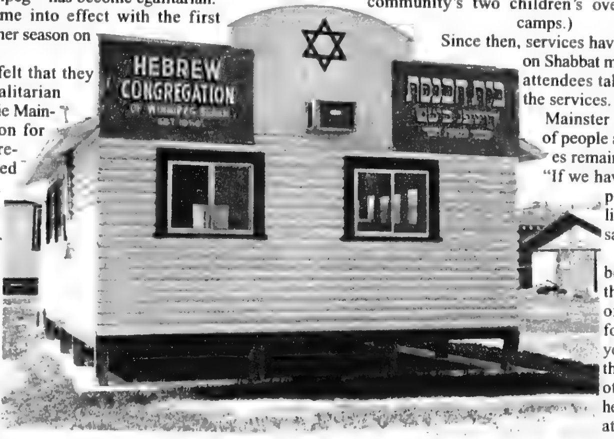
Cottage country shul goes egalitarian

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — The Hebrew Congregation of Winnipeg Beach, a small cottage country synagogue on the shore of Lake Winnipeg – and the only active synagogue in Manitoba outside of Winnipeg – has become egalitarian.

The change came into effect with the first service of the summer season on June 30.

"Some people felt that they wanted to have egalitarian services," says Laurie Mainster, a spokesperson for the informal congregation. "So we voted on it at our last service last September and the majority voted in favour of the proposal."



Mainster said other than switching to egalitarian services, the service at the synagogue remains traditional/conservative.

For more than 100 years, Winnipeg Beach, which is located on the southwest shore of Lake Winnipeg, has been the summer vacation home of choice for large numbers of Winnipeg's Jewish community. The resort is a 45-minute drive northwest of Winnipeg. (Also popular with members of Winnipeg's Jewish community is Gimli, which is 25 kilometres north of Winnipeg Beach.)

The Hebrew Congregation of Winnipeg Beach opened in July 1950. About 200 people were on hand for the small log cabin synagogue's grand opening.

The synagogue operates in the summer months until Labour Day.

In its early years, the congregation had twice daily minyans.

Later, the frequency was reduced to twice a week. In 1998, because of expensive new plumbing requirements, the building was relocated a few blocks north to the Camp Massad campsite. (Camp Massad is one of the Winnipeg Jewish community's two children's overnight summer camps.)

Since then, services have been held only on Shabbat mornings. Regular attendees take turns leading the services.

Mainster said the number of people attending services remains small.

"If we have more than 30 people, it gets a little crowded," he said.

He himself has been involved in the management of the synagogue for the past 30 years, along with three or four others. Although he sold his cottage at the beach 10 years ago, he still comes out every Saturday morning throughout the summer for services.

While women have occasionally attended services at the synagogue in the past, Mainster believes the change to egalitarianism will attract more women to the services and help with the minyans. He said several women turned up for the first egalitarian service to open the season.

"We alternated aliyahs between men and women with a woman receiving the first – rishon – rather than a kohen," he said. "We have one lady who is coming from San Jose who wants to do a Maftir."

The merits of stem cell research

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Through A Sephardi Window

U.S. President George Bush and the American Congress have locked horns in battle. Under the U.S. constitution, the president has the power to veto a Congressional bill. This right to veto is, naturally, not one that's exercised lightly. In fact, in more than six years in office, Bush has used it only three times. It escapes no one that two of the three have been against stem cell research funding.

Throughout history, medical breakthroughs have forever changed the human experience for the better. From the microscope to the understanding of anatomy and physiology, to X-ray technology, anesthetics, antibiotics and more, each has heralded a new era in health, pain relief and longevity.

Nothing, however, compares to, nor holds as much promise as, the potential use of human stem cells.

These early stage embryonic cells have the capability to divide into some 200 distinct organs – one becoming skin tissue, another liver tissue, and yet another heart muscle, etc. The possibilities are as endless as they are mind-numbing. If cells are properly harvested, it is possible to grow a new lung to replace a diseased one, to repair a damaged spinal cord and restore movement to the paralyzed, and so on. Grown in a laboratory, these cells could cure diseases such as Parkinson's, Alzheimer's and diabetes.

Naturally, to accomplish all of this, much research is needed. To do this research requires money, but Bush has impeded government funding for this effort.

In explaining his actions, he has said, "If this legislation became law, it would compel the American taxpayer for the first time in our history to support the deliberate destruction of human embryos. I will not allow our nation to cross this moral line."

In saying this, Bush is rightfully saying that it is wrong to kill a life in order to save a life. When it comes to this ideal, Torah law fully concurs. In the words of the Talmud, "Is one blood redder than the other?" You simply don't kill one life to save another.

Where Judaism differs from Bush's moral stance (which is based on fundamental Christian belief) is on the definition of life. According to Bush, an embryo is a human life. According to the Torah, an embryo is not.

Hence, what to one (Bush's Christian right constituency) is a well-meaning, moral high road meant to preserve life is to the other (Judaism) a needless and cruel move that dashes the hopes of millions of families worldwide.

Even as this debate has divided America, Jews across the spectrum have been united in expressing their dissatisfaction with the veto. Every organization, including both the Orthodox Union and Agudath Israel, has voiced its disappointment.

It's no coincidence that due to Judaism's position on this matter, the most aggressive and cutting-edge research in this area is taking place today in Israel.

In the ping-pong politics of the United States, Congress can pass a bill, the president can veto it, and, in turn, Congress, with a two-thirds majority, has the power to override the veto – in essence, vetoing the veto.

Politics aside, one is left to hope and pray that the Ultimate Healer will bring healing and that we will soon merit a major medical breakthrough in the field of stem cell research.

Richly textured portrait of Peres

Shimon Peres: The Biography* by Michael Bar-Zohar, Random House.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Finally, in his 83rd year, Shimon Peres has won his first election. The Knesset has chosen him as Israel's ninth president.

Over the years, his achievements on behalf of the State of Israel have been prodigious, his participation in the country's political and cultural life unequalled. He was crucially responsible both for the Israeli nuclear weapons program and the 1993 Oslo accords, for which he shared a Nobel Peace Prize with former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin and former Palestinian Authority president Yasser Arafat.

Twice Israel's prime minister, he also served as a deputy defence minister and the minister of Transportation, Communications, Immigrant Absorption, Foreign Affairs and the Treasury.

His associates and political opponents have come and gone. They entered the arena, left it, retired or died. But Peres remained, preparing for the next battle, watching for the next opportunity on the horizon.

Yet, a suspicious and wary Israeli electorate has always rejected him. His many positions have come by way of appointment or elaborate political manoeuvring.

The author of Shimon Peres: The Biography, Michael Bar-Zohar, writes: "To many, Shimon Peres was an enigma and remains one still. A son of Israel whose roots were in a faraway land; a master of the Hebrew language, yet with a foreign accent; the ultimate defence expert of Israel, who never wore a uniform; a mediocre politician, yet a statesman of splendid vision; a kibbutznik without formal education, yet abounding in culture; reserved and self-controlled, yet burning with an inner fire. A complex man of many faces and many contradictions."

His opponents claim that often he failed to tell the truth. When the renowned Abba Eban was asked why Peres didn't fulfil his promise to make him a minister, he quipped cynically, "He didn't want to set a precedent."

The Israeli writer Amos Oz told the author, "I know two kinds of adults. One carries inside himself the dead child that he once was. The other is a very rare kind of adult who carries inside himself a living child – curious, thirsty for love, thirsty for knowledge… That is Shimon. "

More than any other person, Peres encouraged the daring Entebbe Operation, the rescue mission that freed hostages held at Entebbe Airport in Uganda. The world reacted to the successful event with an outburst of admiration. Former Israeli prime minister Menachem Begin proudly said, "'It will heal the nation of the trauma of the Yom Kippur War."

In 1951, Peres discovered that the Canadian army was selling surplus World War II cannons. The asking price was $2 million for 30 cannons. Peres visited Sam Bronfman in Montreal and solicited his help. The whisky baron managed to reduce the price by half. He then asked Peres, "I got you $1 million off the price – who will give you the other million?" Peres answered quietly, "You."

That evening Bronfman invited 50 of his friends to dinner, and the additional money was quickly and enthusiastically raised.

This biography is oddly unbalanced. Too much space is given to Peres' early years in prewar Poland, his time spent as a kibbutz member and his role in building Israel's defence and aerospace industries. It concludes rather abruptly in 1996 with only a four-page chapter to cover the momentous events of the next decade.

Readers will find especially compelling, the vignettes that bring to life Peres' relationship with such personalities as former Israeli prime ministers David Ben-Gurion, Golda Meir, Ariel Sharon and Rabin, former defence minister Moshe Dayan – and others.

All in all, this is a richly textured portrait of a many-sided figure whose life and career span the entire history of Israel.

Resources for the blind, Pt. 2

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

The Jewish Highway

Today I continue my survey of resources for Jews who are blind or have limited vision.

The HebrewVisions helps you create braille documents using Hebrew text. First you need to either copy a block of Hebrew text from a webpage or create some text using a Hebrew word processor. (I use a Mac-based program called Mellel. [redlers.com]) When I typed the word "Devarim" and then pasted the Hebrew characters into the Translator webpage, it automatically created a text file with the corresponding English characters "DVRJM." The text file can be sent for embossing in order to render it into a braille document. [hebrewvisions.org]

Beyond the translator program, the HebrewVisions site also has ready-to-download braille text files of the entire Tanach, as well as Rashi on the Torah, the daily siddur and a kids' collection featuring the magazine Babaganewz. These files can be sent to an embosser for the creation of braille documents.

Jerusalem's Jewish Institute for the Blind was founded in 1902 and "provides a wide range of activities for education, rehabilitation, health and social welfare for the blind and visually impaired in Jerusalem and throughout the country." You can skim through 12 years of the institute's English-language InSight Newsletter. [jewishblind.org]

The Brooklyn-based Jewish Heritage for the Blind has published large-print versions of the books of Esther, Ruth and Lamentations, Psalms, Grace after Meals and Halachic Rulings Relating to the Blind. There are braille editions of the daily and Shabbos Siddurim and the High Holiday Machzorim. [tinyurl.com/23rohy]

Other organizations serving the blind include the Jewish Guild for the Blind [jgb.org], Britain's Jewish Blind & Disabled [jbd.org] and the Israel Guide Dog Center for the Blind. [israelguidedog.org] Also worth noting is the Center for Deaf-Blind Persons, which serves approximately "1,000 persons who have the dual disability of deaf-blindness in Israel." [cdb.org.il/english.html]

With its rocky terrain and the cobblestone roads in its old cities, Israel can be a daunting destination for visitors with disabilities. Several organizations – private and public – are working to make the country more accessible. Israel for All is a travel agency specializing in providing tours of Israel for people with physical limitations. Guided tours for blind or visually impaired visitors emphasize the use of the senses of smell, taste and hearing. Tourists are provided with braille maps and diagrams. [israelaccessibletravel.com]

An article I came across praised Israel's National Parks Authority for its sensitivity toward visitors with special needs. The authority has created 3D models of the Masada and Bet She'an national parks, which enable blind and visually impaired visitors "to literally feel their way around the site." [tinyurl.com/2kwffm] Access Israel – and its Israeli Accessible Tourism Resource Center – is a non-profit organization dedicated to making Israel accessible to both residents and visitors with disabilities. [tinyurl.com/3x4ge5]

Speaking of obstacles, there's a fascinating mitzvah mentioned in the Torah that is relevant to this topic. We are told in Leviticus 19:14, "You shall not… place a stumbling block before the blind…" [tinyurl.com/yunosw] Brooklyn College's Hershey Friedman finds the verse perplexing. "Why single out blind people for this law? Was placing stumbling blocks before blind people a prevalent practice in ancient times?" He concludes that this seemingly simple verse has wider implications. It is "an admonition not to take advantage of the weak and the helpless or to place temptation in the path of those who may be morally weak. It is also a call to action demanding that society and people do everything possible to help the weak, the vulnerable and the helpless." [tinyurl.com/2md373]

Israel recently marked the 40th anniversary of the Six Day War. In my column about the unification of Jerusalem, I mentioned the famous photograph of the three Israeli paratroopers gazing at the Kotel. Zion Karasanti, Yitzhak Yifat and Haim Oshri were reunited at the exact spot where fate brought them together four decades earlier. You can view the remarkable before and after pictures at the following link. [tinyurl.com/36bx6o]

Ignoring the giant mouse in the middle of the room

According to Reports

By
PAUL MICHAELS

The Hamas children's television show featuring Farfur, a Mickey Mouse clone, made news again when the mascot, who spouts extreme anti-Israel and anti-Jewish rhetoric, met his untimely death.

In the show's finale, Farfur was beaten to death by a fictionalized Israeli Shin Bet agent while attempting to reclaim family property in modern Tel Aviv from "the criminal, plundering Jews."

The very idea that the show used a young girl as Farfur's sidekick to incite violence reveals the extent of Hamas' depravity. It was reported in the Israeli media that a number of Palestinians in Gaza became fed up with this abuse of their own children and protested against the program.

Describing the broader context of this episode in the National Post ("Hamas's mascot of death," July 3), Jonathan Kay wrote: "The mouse's martyrdom represents the surreal culmination of a propaganda campaign that began in the early 1990s, when Yasser Arafat took over the Palestinian education system under the terms of Oslo [that called for the need to educate for peace] and immediately began filling the curriculum with Jew hatred. Thus did the schoolchildren who threw rocks at Israeli soldiers in the first intifadah grow up to become suicide bombers in the second.

"This death cult is something that critics of the international community's 'boycott' of Gaza's Hamas-led government conveniently gloss over."

Some critics do more than gloss over this brainwashing campaign – they ignore it altogether. A prime example is Linda McQuaig.

In "Clark offers precedent for Harper," (Toronto Star, June 26), McQuaig completely ignores Hamas' extremist agenda and argues that the international community should negotiate with Hamas. Why? Because Hamas was "democratically elected," and its refusal to "recognize Israel" is met by Israel's refusal to "recognize Palestine."

McQuaig is dead wrong on the latter point, and misled on the former. Israel is officially committed to a two-state solution and is prepared for territorial compromise to achieve a Palestinian state. Hamas is officially committed to Israel's obliteration.

It is true that Hamas was "democratically elected," but only in the formal sense that it accepted the mechanics of the electoral process. As a radical Islamist organization, Hamas is fundamentally opposed to any semblance of real democracy, including civil and human rights such as women's rights, gay rights, freedom of the press, and other forms of tolerance and pluralism that McQuaig likely demands of other regimes.

An irony, which McQuaig ignores, is that that the only place in the Middle East where Palestinians can enjoy such freedoms is Israel. In fact, the Palestinian democratic movement that does exist outside of Hamas was inspired by its exposure to Israeli democracy.

* * *

Meanwhile, Hamas has been portraying itself as a moderate force by securing the release of Alan Johnston, the BBC correspondent who was held hostage in Gaza for 114 days by the Army of Islam, part of the Doghmush clan.

In what must be one of the great photo-ops of our times, former Palestinian Prime Minister Ismail Haniyeh is pictured smiling broadly as he joins hands in overhead triumph with the just-released Johnston.

Lost in all the theatrics is the fact that journalists are not free to report in an unfettered, critical way from Gaza, where they are usually accompanied by "minders" in various guises. Under Hamas – or even Fatah in the West Bank – journalists who don't adhere to the party line face intimidation, harassment and loss of access.

Anthology aims to give girls role models

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Liz Pearl, a therapist, writer and educator, believes girls need positive role models.

The mother of two daughters and a son, Pearl, 42, edited the anthology Living Legacies for our Daughters – a Collection of Contemporary Canadian Women around the time of her eldest daughter's bat mitzvah.

As co-founder, along with Mara Koven, of Kope Associates, a partnership dedicated to the creation of a variety of healing journey literary projects, Pearl has edited two other anthologies: Mourning Has Broken, a collection of writing about grief that she co-edited with Koven, and Brain Attack, a collection of writing about stroke recovery.

She embarked on her latest project, she said, because girls need more role models than they meet in school and synagogue.

"They need models to offset the powerful influences around them from pop culture – something much deeper and broader," Pearl said.

"The message from pop culture is that women are homogeneous in terms of looks and values. I want girls to learn about women's wisdom and hindsight."

Many girls read the Chicken Soup series of books, she said, and "I wanted to give them something else to read, something that can capture their attention and reach them."

The book also served as Pearl's own bat mitzvah project, as she never had one. "Few girls had bat mitzvahs when I was growing up, and I felt that I wanted to do something. This is it," she said.

Together with Koven, who Pearl calls her role model, she created a wish list of 70 women whom they would want in the book.

"We contacted them and heard back from a number of them, each of whom wrote about 1,000 words," Pearl said.

The list of about 50 women includes Prof. Nora Gold, singer Amy Sky, Rabbi Elyse Goldstein, children's singer Sharon Hampson (of Sharon, Lois and Bram), family therapist Sarah Chana Radcliffe and writer Judy Librach.

"Some on the list are well known, others are not known. I looked for women with certain qualities, whether they are stay-at-home mothers, volunteers or entertainers. I didn't turn anyone away."

She aimed the book at girls, she said, "because their search for identity is more confusing than for boys. My purpose is to give them a large range of role models."

The book is not intended to be read like a novel.

"We can't impart all the values in one day, so I envision a girl picking it up, reading a few pages, and then picking it up another day again. The lessons will be ongoing. It is a book of wisdom, and it should be taken bit by bit," Pearl said.

"It's possible that mothers and grandmothers will read the book first, and the girls will pick it up when they're ready."

Canadian Idol

Idol worship: contestant brought relevant, edgier sound

By Abigail Bimman
CJN Intern

Derek Hoffman, who was one of the top 22 finalists on Canadian Idol, kick-started his music career at his bar mitzvah.

His first real gig, at his bar mitzvah luncheon, was with the band Mail Order Bride, a group the 17-year-old still plays in.

Hoffman was eliminated on the June 27 episode of Canadian Idol, during which four contestants were cut, leaving 18 in the running.

"It was really tough because there were so many good singers and so many good performances," he said.

"But if I stayed I definitely would have brought it [the] next week."

Hoffman, who is from Aurora, Ont., became the music director of Or Hadash Synagogue, in Newmarket, Ont., at 15. He also sang and accompanied the shul's spiritual leader, Cantor Martin Steinhouse.

"My favourite part of going to synagogue was the singing and the music and hearing all these awesome tunes," Hoffman said.

Canadian Idol was a learning experience as well as hard work, he recalled. "You learn new things every single day. It's hard work and it's non-stop. The performances in it are absolutely a blast."

The thought of elimination didn't faze Hoffman, though, who felt blessed to have made it as far as he did.

This year is a big one for Hoffman. He graduated from Aurora High School in late June and plans to attend Seneca@York's independent music production program this [illegible]

"I've made two top 20s this year," he said proudly, referring to his Canadian Idol standing and his admission into the competitive music program that accepts just 20 candidates. "It was really a big achievement for me."

Along with being the lead vocalist and guitarist for Mail Order Bride, he and another band member run a small studio, ForeverEver, out of Hoffman's home. ForeverEver records, engineers and produces other bands' music.

"I've just been working with a lot of younger local bands that have been listening to Mail Order Bride and kind of look up to us," he said.

"I just want bands to know that they just need to have the right start, and as long as they get their head in the game physically, they'll be OK, and people will come out to see them. I think it's all about putting confidence in the younger bands."

For Hoffman, the jump from Aurora gigs to national television was a big one.

"It seems surreal to me because up until now I've just been doing this on my own at home, playing for the kids that I know," he said.

"Being on the biggest show in Canada – it just seems like an enormous leap and almost unreal."

He described Mail Order Bride's music as indie pop rock and said he liked to reflect this genre in his performance choices on Canadian Idol.

"I'm gonna keep going on and I'm going to keep working hard, and I think that all the people that were watching me at home are aware of my musical career and aware of my band and are going to keep watching."

During Hoffman's last appearance on Canadian Idol, on June 25, he sang a rendition of the All American Rejects' hit Move Along.

While Hoffman said the performance went well, he did receive some negative feedback from the judges on air.

"You sang that really bad," quipped the often-harsh Zack Werner.

The other judges said they saw rock-star potential in Hoffman, and hoped he stuck it out long enough to show it. While the judges predicted the elimination of the three contestants who were cut along with Hoffman, none had predicted that he would leave, too.

Hoffman said he brought a new sound to Idol. "In the past, a lot of idols have come out and had a generic musical career, nothing special, nothing memorable... a lot of stuff that's coming out could have come out in the last 10 years and you wouldn't know which year."

Hoffman said his music is more in line with current trends, and judge Farley Flex echoed that thought after the singer's last performance.

"One of the objectives of this show is to be relevant to what's going on in the marketplace," Flex said.

"I look at you and I see your approach to things, and I get a sense of relevance."

Hoffman compared his sound and originality to bands like Fall Out Boy and the All American Rejects.

"They may not have necessarily the super-fantastic, Tina Turner/Whitney Houston vocalists, but they have presence and emotion, and just that sound to them."

Hoffman said his sound brought in a new demographic to the show, people who want an edgier sound that's different from pop.

And Judaism tied into Hoffman's life even on Canadian Idol.

"It helps having two other Jewish members on the judging panel," Hoffman said of Werner and Jake Gold.

Hoffman discussed Judaism with them, as well as with the show's lawyer, David Steinberg.

"It's very interesting to see. To casually talk about these kind of things and see these connections, it's kind of neat," Hoffman said.

His experience on the show has been very positive, he said.

"Ultimately it's just pushed me along in my music career.

"It's really taught me that I have talent and if I had any doubt before, four professional judges told me I'm one of the top 22 singers in Canada."

Derek Hoffman, Mail Order Bride frontman, was among the top 22 finalists in Canadian Idol.

When Richard Lewis donated his blood, smiles and warm greetings would routinely be the way nurses welcomed him.

"He was hugely popular at the clinic," said John Bromley, regional communications manager for Canadian Blood Services (CBS).

"The staff looked forward to him coming because they perceived him as someone who genuinely wanted to give back."

A regular donor since he was in his 20s, Lewis was a kind soul who regularly took three hours out of his day to donate platelets – the components of blood that are often used to treat cancer patients.

On one such visit last summer to CBS, Lewis' donation caused some concern.

"They said your blood looks a little off, go see your doctor," Lewis' wife Jan Silverman recalled.

At the time, Lewis felt fine. In fact, he and Silverman went on their annual canoeing trip to the pristine waters of Killarney.

But shortly after the trip, on Yom Kippur, Lewis received devastating, shocking news – he had acute myelogenous leukemia (AML).

Had Lewis not donated blood, he very likely would have had no idea he was ill, since he had no symptoms.

For the next several months, Lewis – a pharmacist who made house calls, an active participant in his synagogue, a devoted husband and father of two – waged a valiant battle against leukemia.

He had donated platelets to the benefit of so many others, and he now became the recipient of someone else's kindness.

"Each time I saw him receiving blood, I would always think that somebody had taken this time to do this and how it was helping my husband," Silverman said, adding that receiving platelets likely prolonged Lewis' life.

Unfortunately, Lewis passed away recently at age 59.

To pay tribute to him and to highlight how critically blood is needed, Peter Seligman, a close family friend, recently donated for his 150th time in Lewis' honour.

"Richard was a soft-spoken, gentle man – the definition of a mensch," Seligman said.

"I think of giving blood [in his honour] as the purest form of tzedakah. It's a unique gift that is helping someone and that was Richard's motivation for doing it. It's mine, too."

Seligman gave a platelet donation, and CBS notes that there is a particularly large need for this type of contribution.

"The need for platelets increases every year, particularly because of new cancer treatments," Bromley said.

"We have this whole philosophy of sharing your vitality and both Richard and Peter have shown how to do that."

Silverman, who accompanied Seligman to his milestone donation, said she hopes Lewis' story will spur people to give blood.

"For me, if this can lead to one more person getting out to donate, that would be extraordinary," she said.

"Don't just think about it – do it."

For more information about giving blood, call 1-888-2-DONATE, or visit www.bloodservices.ca.

MEHADRIN KOSHER SUPERVISION

Toronto has embraced a new kashrut supervision through the introduction of Mehadrin Kosher Supervision, led by the esteemed Rabbi Moshe Levy, Rosh Kollel, Nahal Yisrael.

Mehadrin Kosher aims to be one of the best kashrut supervisions in Ontario, with the one goal of absolute strict adherence to all kashrut laws, through knowledgeable, dedicated and experienced kashrut professionals. Mehadrin Kosher is already functioning in six Jewish food establishments in Toronto including a number of restaurants and banquet facilities.

Similar to other major North American cities, including New York, Miami, Los Angeles and Montreal, Toronto's acceptance of choice, and therefore competition amongst kashrut organizations, will no doubt enhance the high standards of kashrut supervision in Ontario.

Universities express support for Israeli academics

Canadian schools criticize proposal by British teachers' union

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

Canadian universities continue to line up in support of Israeli academics after a May 30 decision by Britain's largest teachers' union advising its members to consider a boycott of Israeli academic institutions.

Many Canadian universities, including York, McGill, Concordia, the University of British Columbia and the Université de Montréal, were quick to denounce the call by the British University and College Union (UCU).

Over the last two weeks, more Canadian universities have spoken out against the UCU motion, including the University of Western Ontario, Dalhousie, the University of Ottawa, Université de Québec à Montréal and the universities of Manitoba, Winnipeg, Calgary and Alberta.

Les Viner, chair of the Canadian Council for Israel and Jewish Advocacy's University Outreach Committee (UOC), is heartened at the nationwide academic response.

"It is important that so many Canadian university presidents have stressed their pride in their collaboration with Israeli institutions and have encouraged it to continue," he told The CJN last week.

"Israeli academics are leaders in fields such as medical sciences, technology and engineering. Canada has a lot to gain from further collaboration."

On June 26, the University of Toronto, Canada's largest university, weighed in on the matter.

President David Naylor sent a strongly worded letter to Sally Hunt, general secretary of the UCU, lambasting her organization on its boycott proposal.

U of T, Naylor wrote, objects "to the scapegoating of any country's academics by those whose quarrel is with the policies of that country's government."

Naylor continued: "I am certainly not blind to the criticisms that can be made of many governments and social institutions, including our own. However, professors and university teachers worldwide are reading about your proposed boycott and asking themselves: After our Israeli colleagues, who is next?"

The letter, which is published on U of T's website, also affirms the university's support of its Israeli counterparts.

"In the years ahead, the University of Toronto will be deepening, not diminishing, its institutional ties to Israeli universities," Naylor wrote.

Karen Burke, executive director of the UOC, said that 14 Canadian universities have so far decried the UCU position.

On his school's website, Gilles Patry, president of the University of Ottawa also condemned the UCU stance.

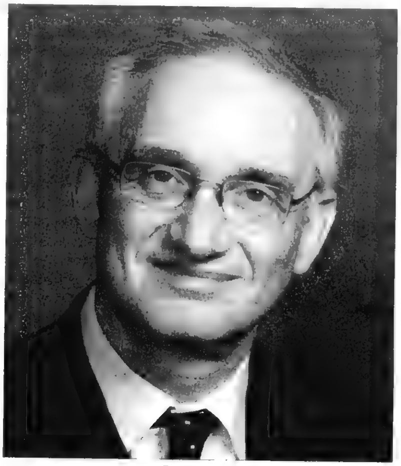
"This boycott goes against the fundamental university values of freedom of expression and free circulation of ideas," Patry said. "To attempt to limit the ability of Israeli universities to freely engage in scholarship and teaching… is attacking all universities at their core mission."

Though individual universities have publicly denounced the UCU position, the Canadian Association of University Teachers (CAUT), an umbrella organization representing nearly 55,000 Canadian post-secondary teachers and other academic staff, has taken a different position on the issue.

CAUT executive director James Turk, told The CJN that his organization believes there has been a "great deal of misinformation" about the UCU proposal.

"Contrary to how the motion was widely characterized in the press here in Canada and overseas," Turk wrote, "it is important to note that passage of the resolution does not mean that an academic boycott is in place. It only means that individual UCU branches and their members will now debate the pros and cons of a boycott."

Turk said the CAUT normally doesn't comment on "policies or decisions taken through the internal democratic structures of our sister organizations," and "in this case, we have not condemned UCU for encouraging a discussion of a contentious issue, since unfettered discussion, evaluation and critique are the essence of academic freedom."



Les Viner

Quebec universities oppose boycott

MONTREAL — The Université de Montréal (U de M) and the Université du Québec à Montréal (UQAM) have joined several other Canadian universities in denouncing the main union of British college professors' decision in May to boycott Israeli academic institutions.

U de M rector Luc Vinet stated: "Such a boycott, which proposes the rupture of dialogue between intellectuals, represents essentially the negation of the most fundamental university values, which are freedom of expression and the promotion of the exchange of ideas.

"Whatever anyone's opinions on the Middle East conflict, the resolution of the confrontation can only come through dialogue and not through gestures of closure like the one that is suggested by the University and College Union," he added.

UQAM interim rector Danielle Laberge had a similar message. "While the university is being subjected to more and more pressures in the context of growing globalization, and while the democratic debate claimed by the University and College Union has its place, the choice to boycott all of the universities of one country runs clearly contrary to the very idea of a university," she said, adding that a fundamental characteristic of academe is open debate.

New York Chabadniks tour Saskatchewan

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Two rabbinical students from New York's Chabad Lubavitch movement are in Saskatchewan to meet Jews across the province.

"The main purpose is to electrify Judaism a little, bring in a fresh burst," Shmuli Raitman, 22, who is originally from Melbourne, Australia, said in a phone interview.

"The Jewish population of Regina is like [the population of] one building on the Upper West Side [of Manhattan]," said his travel mate, Rabbi Yisrael Kugel, 23, who is from New York.

The chassidic Chabad Lubavitch movement sends about 300 pairs of students across the globe each summer to complement their schooling. Rabbi Kugel recently received his rabbinical ordination and Raitman hopes to get his this fall.

While the pair's combined travel resumé read like a United Nations program and includes Germany, Russia, Ukraine, Nigeria, Japan, Thailand and France, they admit that the prairie province was off their radar.

Rabbi Kugel joked that he needed to figure out how to spell "Saskatchewan" so he could look it up on Google and have an idea of where he was headed.

The two landed in Regina on June 25 and have already visited many places across the province, from larger cities such as Moose Jaw and Saskatoon to smaller places such as Estevan, where they met a woman who calls herself the "last Jew" in town.

"It's been an unbelievable experience," Raitman said.

"The Jewish people here are very warm and very receptive."

As welcoming as the locals are, Rabbi Kugel said the pair's traditional black suits, hats and beards are a novel sight on Saskatchewan's streets.

"Everybody that sees us turns their heads when we walk down the street. It's such an interesting sight for them to see us… but everybody is very nice and friendly and accommodating," he said.

They were quoted in the Regina Leader-Post as being comparable to "missionaries," but Rabbi Kugel called this a misinterpretation, noting that they're not aiming to convert anyone.

"According to chassidic thought, every single Jewish person has a neshamah, a Jewish soul, that makes them equally Jewish… and which is powerfully connected with God," he said.

"Some people make a misunderstanding that what makes a Jew is how he acts. We look at it that a Jew is a Jew no matter what.

"The message we are trying to bring out is that we are not trying to impose anything new on anyone else, we are just trying to bring out what he has within."

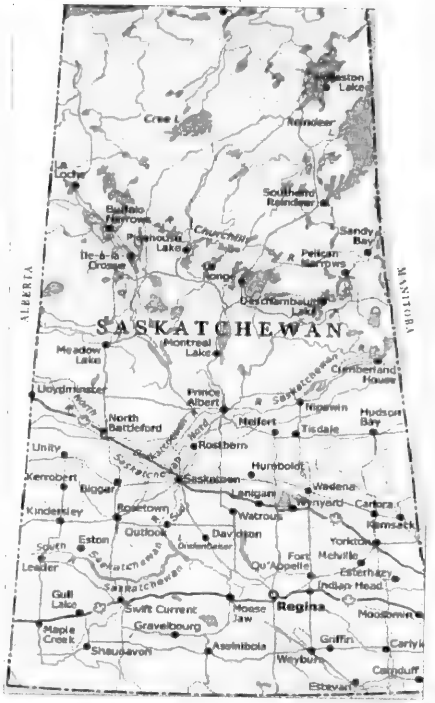
Rabbi Kugel admits that there is a fine line between encouraging religious action from that soul and imposing values.

"It is a difficult thing to explain. We want everyone to grow according to their own level," he said.

They have already had many interesting experiences with the small Jewish population in Saskatchewan.

Raitman shared an anecdote about being caught in Estevan visiting an old Jewish cemetery later than expected on a Friday afternoon. The duo had planned to spend Shabbat in Winnipeg, six hours away, but they couldn't reach the Manitoba capital in time, so they pulled off the road in the town of Weyburn to spend Shabbat there.

They looked through some old notes and found a 1993 phone number for a Holocaust survivor in the town.



Unsure of whether the man would still be alive, the pair reached him, and he was delighted to speak with them.

Rabbi Kugel also enjoyed a chance encounter with a Vancouver Jew in their Regina hotel. He was visiting old family grave sites and needed someone to translate the Hebrew on the tombstone.

"Meeting a Jew randomly in Regina is like finding a cow on the moon… I almost fainted on the spot," Rabbi Kugel said, only partly in jest.

He translated the tombstone from pictures on the man's digital camera. While speaking, he and Raitman learned that he had never put on tfillin.

The next morning at 6 a.m., they met the man in the hotel lobby, put on tfillin together, prayed and sang mazal tov.

"It was an absolutely amazing experience," Rabbi Kugel recalled.

The duo said they gained an appreciation for Saskatchewan Jews.

"One thing that we noticed is that in New York you can put yourself on cruise [control] and be Jewish… but in terms of commitment, you could learn a lot from these smaller Jewish places. Whatever level that they are committed is very inspiring," Rabbi Kugel said.

The pair heads back to New York on July 17.

MWS B'nai Mitzvah Ceremony Highlights Students' Theatrical and Musical Talents

What makes the MWS B'nai Mitzvah/graduation ceremony so unique?

This alternative, secular life-cycle event provides a rare opportunity for graduating students, parents and educators to collectively shape their B'nai Mitzvah ceremony, custom-tailoring it to highlight the specific interests and talents of the graduates. Students select a Jewish topic of their choice, research it, and present their papers as part of a community ceremony. This year's topics included: the evolution of Bar/Bat Mitzvahs, tolerance towards mixed-religious families, the Kindertransport and the Pale of Settlement.

The research projects were woven together with music, folk dancing and a short play, inspired by one graduate's project about the history of "Fidder on the Roof". To showcase the fact that each graduate played an instrument, the students formed an ensemble, and thematically appropriate Yiddish, Hebrew and English songs were sung and played throughout the ceremony.

To add an extra level of depth, students participated in The Holocaust Centre of Toronto's 'Bar/Bat Mitzvah of Remembrance Twinning Project'. Students researched a lost child of the Holocaust, and shared information about their 'twin', complemented by a special candle lighting dedication.

Baycrest VP retires — well, sort of

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

There's retirement, and then there's retirement as prominent geriatrician Dr. Michael Gordon defines it.

Gordon, 66, recently stepped down as vice-president of medical administration and head of geriatrics and internal medicine at Baycrest. His hope, he said, is that he will be able to carry out his other duties and interests with less pressure.

He will stay on as a staff geriatrician, seeing patients at Baycrest's ambulatory geriatric assessment clinic, and he will also teach and serve as medical director of Baycrest's palliative care and clinical ethics programs.

Dr. Michael Gordon

Twice a week, he will continue to give seminars on medical ethics and geriatric medicine to medical students.

He also remains a professor of medicine and a member of the joint centre for bioethics at the University of Toronto.

As well, Gordon is a member of the council of the College of Physicians and Surgeons of Ontario, a contribution he makes to the medical profession that he considers to be "a great responsibility and a great honour. It is fascinating, stimulating and illuminating."

What he will have now, he said, is more flexibility.

He wants to do more public speaking, for instance. And Gordon, who writes a monthly column for The CJN, said he has "a real passion for writing. Before, I could only write in between doing other things."

The medical-legal field and government committees are other areas he said he would like to get more involved with.

Gordon said he became interested in geriatric medicine during his training in Scotland, and at the old Shaarei Tzedek Hospital in Jerusalem, which had "the first geriatric unit in a general hospital."

He didn't hesitate when asked if he would make the same speciality choice again. "Absolutely!" he said. "It's been a wonderful career, a phenomenal experience."

During his tenure, he said, "Baycrest has grown and developed into one of the pre-eminent geriatric centres in the world."

Among the favourite aspects of his job has been the interaction with Baycrest residents and clients, which he calls "a delight," and with medical trainees. "I get naches from all of them."

Gordon said he regrets that more people don't go into geriatric medicine. "It doesn't have the attraction that some other specialties do. It is often seen as paternalistic."

Also, he said, it's not a particularly highly technological field.

Rather, Gordon said, geriatrics focuses on high-quality clinical care. "You keep your eye on all aspects of care of the elderly: medical, psycho-social, mental health, and end of life questions."

Elder care, he believes, "has to be core to what we do in medicine."

There's one more thing he hopes to have more time to do: cycling. Even while favouring an ankle that he hurt during one of his runs, he said that he loves taking long bicycle rides around the city.

Chana Szpilman Wallace celebrates her 100th birthday, surrounded by family and friends.

Centenarian subscribes to lemonade principle

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

Whenever Chana Szpilman Wallace, who just turned 100, has had trouble in her life, she's tried to make the best of things. If life served her lemons, she made lemonade.

Wallace has survived Auschwitz and Bergen-Belsen, the loss of two beloved husbands and both sons, cancer, a heart attack and other hardships that life threw in her way. Yet she has taken every painful tragedy and turned it into love for others, frequently offering a helping hand to those in need without asking for anything in return.

More than 150 family members and friends gathered at the Venetian in Vaughan recently to tell the centenarian of the affection and respect they have for her.

Along with her Canadian family and friends, guests from Israel, Brazil, New York, California, Miami, Fla., and Cleveland, Ohio, attended. The party was organized by Wallace's "daughter-by-love" (actually her niece), Helen Shifman.

As Wallace doesn't have any living children or grandchildren, Shifman told her many years ago, "If I have any children, they will be your grandchildren."

Wallace, who lives alone, does her own shopping and manages to attend to many of her affairs, recalled past events with clarity and spoke of the philosophy she developed to cope with the dark side of her life.

Born in 1907 in Ostrowiec, Poland, to Reuven and Chaya Szpilman, Wallace was the second youngest of eight children. Her father was a renowned violinist and music teacher.

"My father taught the violin to his brother, the father of Wladyslaw Szpilman, whose story became the award-winning book and movie, The Pianist," she said.

At 18, she was married – the match was arranged – to Jankiel Lustig. When Wallace was 20, their first son, Liebela, was born and when she was 22, she gave birth to their son Uris. Uris died 2½ weeks after birth, of pneumonia.

The nightmares of the 1940s that Wallace experienced – the ghetto, labour camps, starvation, death camps and the loss of most of her family – were recorded in 1997 for Steven Spielberg's Survivors of the Shoah documentary.

After liberation by Canadian soldiers on April 15, 1945, five days after her 38th birthday, Wallace began searching for her family. She was reunited with her husband who had survived the concentration camps.

Soon after, they learned that their son Liebela, then 17, had been murdered by the Poles after the war ended. Her husband was overtaken by grief and died of a heart attack.

Wallace lived in Munich for several years and then, sponsored by her brother-in-law, she came to Canada in 1948, where she joined other family members.

She recalls that she went to look for a job at a factory on Spadina Avenue. "When the boss asked me what I could do, I said nothing. He gave me a job because he said no one else was ever so honest. He taught me and gave me special jobs."

In 1950, she married David Wallace (actually Wloschowske). When her husband came to Canada, the judge at the port declared after hearing his name, "That's too hard to pronounce, so your name will be Wallace."

The couple opened a ladieswear store, Lilibet, at Yonge and Lawrence. David died in 1966 and Wallace sold the business.

Looking back, she credits her family and her deep faith in God for her longevity. "My six beautiful grandchildren gave me a new life and a reason to keep living," she said.

She added that it's important to have a positive attitude and to be kind.

"I tell people, 'don't say you are having a bad day.' You have to think positive and be grateful for everything you have. And don't live in the past, Remember the past but live for today and tomorrow. And be kind to others and you will be happy."

When asked what she looks forward to, Wallace smiled and said, "I want to dance at my grandchildren's weddings. And I wish my whole body would be like my memory."

Her "grandson," Brian Shifman (actually her great-nephew), said that Wallace "is a true mentor to everyone and an inspiration."

Turing to her, he said, "Bubbie, you're one-of-a-kind, a diamond in the rough. You've been through so much yet you continue to stay positive and to be good to people. You deserve all the good wishes because you've earned it."

St. Adolphe mayor apologizes to new resort owners

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The mayor of St. Adolphe d'Howard has apologized for remarks made by the Laurentian village's general manager about the purchase of a local resort by a group of chassidic investors.

In a statement, Pierre Roy extended the olive branch to the group, members of the Satmar sect, that now owns the 53-hectare Miramont sur le Lac, saying the opinions expressed to Radio-Canada television by Michel Binette are not shared by the council of the picturesque municipality 45 minutes north of Montreal.

Binette said there is concern among St. Adolphe's 2,900 permanent residents that the chassidim will not integrate and will turn the resort into a ghetto. He is also worried that there will be legal troubles with the community like those in a nearby village.

Binette was referring to a long-running court case involving Val Morin and another chassidic community, the Belz, over two houses used as a synagogue and a religious school within the enclave where about 60 Belz families have summer homes. In 2005 Quebec Superior Court ruled that the community is violating zoning bylaws. The community's appeal of that decision is scheduled to be heard in October.

Roy said he regretted Binette's choice of words. "We will have upon his return from vacation abroad an exchange with a view to clarifying the situation with him," he said.

Roy said the council would like to establish harmonious relations between the new owners and the town's other residents, whose numbers swell to 12,000 during the summer.

"Whatever their religious allegiance, the council wishes to welcome the new citizens with a spirit of openness," Roy said. He said the council wants to meet the new owners to better understand what their plans are for the property.

He admitted that some people living near the Miramont have expressed concern about the new chassidic ownership, but he said much of that has been fuelled by rumours.

"The citizens are aware of the litigation going on [in Val Morin]… They obviously want to be reassured that the tranquility that is the charm of living here will be preserved."

The Miramont property is zoned for recreational/touristic use and for single-family homes. The new owners have erected a two-metre high fence around the complex, which consists of a motel, chalets, a restaurant, conference hall and indoor pool. They reportedly paid $3.5 million for the lakefront property.

The Satmar's summer base has long been about 25 kilometres northeast of St. Adolphe, in Val David, where two homes were destroyed by arson in June.

That enclave, however, is becoming crowded as the community grows, and more space is needed. There's also demand from families who cannot afford to buy a house.

The sale was finalized before the Val David fires took place.

Abraham Kaufman, one of the investors, said the intention is to rent out the facilities to chassidim in the summer, but otherwise leave the property as it is. Kaufman has not returned calls from The CJN since releasing a statement June 26.

He said at that time that the group was "appalled" by Binette's remarks and emphasized that any changes that may be made will conform to the law.

Security funding announced

Under the program, government-approved security projects are eligible for 50 per cent coverage of total project costs to a maximum of $100,000.

The program will also subsidize costs incurred for contractors, labour, installation, training on new equipment and up to 25 per cent of the cost for preliminary security assessments.

It was Day's second announcement on crime prevention in as many days, after pledging $6.8 million for 27 initiatives in communities across the province of Quebec on July 4.

Details about how organizations could apply for funding were not immediately available, but Day said his ministry would soon be "reaching out to communicate this information" to communities nationwide.

The fund will be available until March 21, 2009, when the program will be reviewed.

Both Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) and B'nai Brith praised the plan but lamented its lack of scope.

Bernie Farber, the CJC's chief executive officer, told The CJN that the program should contain funds in the $15 to $20 million range in order to be effective.

"We welcome this proposal… but if you're going to do something like this, proper resources need to be put in the mix," Farber said. "We hope the government will retain an openness to understand that $3 million may not be enough to address the [security] needs of these communities."

B'nai Brith spokesperson Frank Dimant voiced similar concerns.

"This pilot initiative must quickly be expanded and made permanent so that it is fully in step with the growing security needs of at-risk communities," Dimant said in a statement.

According to B'nai Brith statistics, there were 935 anti-Semitic incidents in Canada last year.

The federal Liberals were quick to pounce on the Conservative program, calling it an "act of political desperation" and a "watered-down version" of a proposed Liberal security plan put forward by Liberal leader Stéphane Dion last March.

Dion's plan, they said, would have committed retroactive funding to organizations that had already paid for increased security measures to protect their communities.

"It's just not enough money... it misses the mark," Thornhill Liberal MP Susan Kadis told The CJN. "We believe it shouldn't be a pilot project, it should just be in place."

Asked how much money her party would commit to such a fund, Kadis said it's still determining the amount.

Kadis, who chairs an ongoing Liberal caucus task force on security funding, said she is still consulting with affected communities and will issue a report in late August.

Think carefully before new spouse moves in Family Matters

by

John Syrtash

B.A. (Hon.), LL.B.
Partner, Beard Winter LLP

Question. I am intending to marry this year. I have a house which is currently rented and I am living in a rental apartment. After marriage I will continue living in the apartment and my house will also continue to be rented. In case of a divorce, do I have to split my rental house with my spouse even though it will not be our matrimonial house and is solely in my name?

Answer. The value of the rental property as of the date of marriage is not considered a "matrimonial home" unless both of you reside in it on the date of separation. So unless you both move into it and reside in it on the day you separate, then its value as of the date of marriage is excluded from any calculation of your "net worth" when calculating property division.

However, its increase in value from the date of marriage to the date of separation — if you still own that rental property — will be included in calculating your net worth. This is called "net family property." It is subject to calculation on how much you may have to pay your wife in any property settlement, when comparing the increase of your net worth from the date of marriage to the date of separation. That increase in net worth (net family property) is compared to your wife's increase in net worth and the person with the higher increase pays the "poorer" spouse an "equalization payment" to "equalize" any difference between the two spouses over the course of the marriage.

The exception is the matrimonial home, meaning the home in which the parties resided together on the date of separation (not to be confused with any property either party may have owned on the date of the marriage and later sold.) The entire value — even the premarital value of the matrimonial home — is included in the net worth (net family property) of the registered owner.

I strongly recommend that anyone who owns a valuable home, with their new spouse about to move in, sign a marriage contract to exclude its premarital value in the event of separation, unless that new spouse is about to invest significantly with their own money. A person with substantial equity should think carefully when getting married before allowing their new spouse to simply "move in."

Attali says goodbye to Atlantic Canada

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — It was a bittersweet moment for Marc Attali.

Israel's consul general to Montreal and Atlantic Canada was making his final trip to Halifax before ending his five-year stay in Canada. He returns to his homeland later this summer. This was a chance to say goodbye to many good friends he's made, and an opportunity to reflect on what those friendships have meant.

Marc Attali

On this bright, sunny Sunday morning, he greeted more than 100 community members who had walked five kilometres in solidarity with Israel.

"I saw this march as a valuable act of support for Israel," he told the crowd, which included several members of the non-Jewish community, supporters of Israel through Bridges For Peace and the International Christian Embassy in Jerusalem.

"I see this event as an important reminder to those who question the legitimacy of the Jewish state. It lets people know that Israel is a sister democracy to Canada, sharing common values," he said.

In a later interview, Attali stressed his appreciation of the work of the Atlantic Jewish communities – "the volunteers and leadership and their support through joy and sadness. In my almost five years as consul, I've met so many wonderful people who have had a key role in Canadian leadership for Israel."

While he was in Atlantic Canada, Attali planned to attend several major functions.

In particular, he said, "I will be making my first trip to Camp Kadimah [in Barss Corner, N.S., 100 kilometres from Halifax], which I had planned to do last year, but the war broke out and I was stuck in Montreal. The previous summer I was in Israel, so this makes good timing, my last trip to the region. It will be an opportunity to see the vibrancy of the youth."

He added that he would talk to the staff (campers arrived later in the week) about the importance of strengthening Jewish identity and Jewish education.

"We're talking of the future of the Jewish people here," he said.

His return to Israel will not mean cutting his ties to the Atlantic region, he said.

"There is a big mission to Israel [more than 60 people] in October. I hope to have a reunion with the community there," he noted.

Ottawa volunteers honoured

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — It was all in the family earlier last month when Robert Greenberg presented his brother Roger Greenberg with the 2007 Gilbert Greenberg Distinguished Service Award.

The award, the highest tribute that the Ottawa Jewish community bestows upon an individual for exceptional service over the course of many years, is named after the late past president of what later became Ottawa's Jewish federation, Gilbert Greenberg, who was the father of Robert and Roger.

"It has now been 21 consecutive years that I have been presenting my father's award," Robert said as he introduced his brother.

When their father died in 1980, his dream of a community campus had not been realized, but in 1994, Roger became chair of the Community Capital Campaign, which resulted in the construction of the Jewish Community Campus.

Today, the campus houses the Soloway Jewish Community Centre (SJCC,) the Hillel Lodge home for the aged, Hillel Academy day school, and a number of Jewish communal agencies and organizations.

In addition to his ongoing leadership in many areas of the local Jewish community, Roger Greenberg, chairman and CEO of Minto Developments Inc., is also involved in numerous other causes, including Autism Ontario's Ottawa chapter; the Ottawa Children's Treatment Centre; the Ottawa Hospital Foundation Board; and the Community Foundation of Ottawa.

The Greenberg award was one of three community volunteer awards presented June 6 at the 73rd annual general meeting of the Jewish Federation of Ottawa.

The Shem Tov Community Volunteer Award was presented by the Ottawa Citizen to Sam Ages, an octogenarian who is well known throughout the community for his many years of volunteerism.

Mitchell Miller received this year's Freiman Family Young Leadership Award, which goes to someone under age 40 who shows excellent leadership. Receiving the award from A.J. Freiman, Miller gave credit to the strong influence of his parents, Laya and Ken Miller, "people who do a great deal, but quietly. My sister and I had a great foundation, knowing that every day they were going out doing things to make the community better."

MONTREAL — Liberal leader Stéphane Dion said he is in favour of Canada's restoring aid and normal relations with the Palestinian Authority in light of the dissolution of its Hamas-led government.

"What is Canada waiting for? If we say we want to help the president [Mahmoud Abbas], then we need to put our money where our mouth is. The prime minister of Israel has recognized [the new Palestinian government]. Where is the problem?"

Dion made the comment in response to a question at a meeting with representatives of ethnic media in Montreal last week.

Also on the Middle East, Dion said he would raise the issue of water management with Jordan's King Abdullah II at his scheduled meeting with him during the monarch's official visit to Canada this month.The shortage of water is likely to become a worsening problem in the Middle East, he said, and he believes Canada has the expertise in this field to be of assistance.

On the humanitarian crisis in Darfur, Dion said pressure must be put on China, which is Sudan's main trading partner. He said Canada's influence on China has been weakened because Prime Minister Stephen Harper has "antagonized" the Chinese without achieving any improvement in that country's human rights record.

On Afghanistan, Dion said he would honour Canada's commitment to keep combat troops in Kandahar until February 2009 if he forms a government before that mandate expires. If still in opposition, he said the Liberals would oppose any further extension.

"We did not favour extending the mission beyond 2007, but we did it, and Canada has to respect its international commitments."

He said Canada should be planning with NATO and the Afghan government for what will happen when Canada leaves 19 months from now. Dion thinks Canada can play an important non-military role in the country's development.

On general foreign policy, Dion said Canada should be "a good citizen of the world, helping the cause of peace, justice and security," and he emphasized his belief in protection of the environment and sustainable development.

"If we want to do something about Darfur, we need a strong relationship with China," he said.

On Quebec's reasonable accommodation debate, Dion said Canada's Charter of Rights and Freedoms must be the guiding principle. "The charter says the multicultural reality of Canada must be taken into account… This is a never-ending debate in a secular state, but Canada is well-equipped to find solutions, especially under a Liberal government."

Dion said the state must be secular, noting that he was the one who conceived the idea of transforming Quebec's public school boards from religiously-based to language-based almost 10 years ago. Maintaining Catholic and Protestant school boards was not his vision of "Canada in the 21st century."

Dion stressed that the Liberals are committed to the concept of multiculturalism and would review some of the cuts to spending in this area that have been made by the Harper government.

"This does not mean that all festivals will get all the funding they like, but we believe it is necessary to celebrate the different cultures and help them as much as possible," he said.

Italian PM Prodi demands Hamas free Shalit

By JACK KHOURIE
© Ha'aretz Daily Newpaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Italy's visiting prime minister urged Gaza's Hamas rulers on Monday to release abducted Israel Defence Forces soldier Gilad Shalit, while reaffirming his country's support for Palestinian Authority President Mahmoud Abbas.

Romano Prodi is on a three-day trip to Israel and the West Bank to discuss ways to promote Mideast peacemaking.

At a news conference with Prime Minister Ehud Olmert, Prodi demanded immediate freedom for Israeli Cpl. Gilad Shalit, who was seized more than a year ago near Gaza by three groups linked to Hamas.

An audio tape that Hamas issued on the June 25 anniversary of his capture has been the only sign of life from him since.

"I call on Hamas to release Gilad Shalit without further delay," Prodi said in remarks translated from Italian. "He has been in captivity for too long."

Asked about Israeli media reports that Italy is helping to mediate the release of two Israeli soldiers abducted by Lebanese guerrillas last year, Prodi said Rome "had made several requests for information on their whereabouts, condition and possible terms for freeing them but, we never received specific information that could secure their release." He did not elaborate.

Hezbollah gunmen abducted Eldad Regev and Ehud Goldwasser in a cross-border raid that touched off the Second Lebanon War last July. There has been no sign of life from them since.

Meanwhile, the families of all three abducted soldiers met in Paris with French President Nicolas Sarkozy, who said Monday he would use all the power at his disposal to return them home safely.

Sarkozy spoke in depth about Shalit, who holds joint Israeli and French citizenship, saying he considers the IDF corporal to be a fully fledged French national.

"He promised us that he's doing all the efforts he can in this matter," Shalit's father, Noam Shalit, said in English after the meeting.

Addressing the issue of Regev and Goldwasser, Sarkozy said he considers Hezbollah to be a terrorist organization.

The French president said his estimation of Hezbollah has not changed despite his government's issuing of permission to members of the group to visit France for talks with rival Lebanese factions on the future of the Middle Eastern country.

He pledged to the families to raise the issue of the abducted soldiers with Lebanese representatives when they next met.

At the Jerusalem news conference, Prodi reaffirmed Italy's support for Abbas and the emergency government he set up in the West Bank following Hamas' violent takeover of Gaza a month ago. At the same time, he said, a humanitarian crisis in Gaza must be avoided at all costs.

Crossings into Gaza from Israel and Egypt were shut after Hamas seized control of the coastal strip. Crossings with Israel have opened for humanitarian aid.

Olmert said that despite the events in Gaza, Israel and Italy continue to see the territory and the West Bank as parts of a single Palestinian entity.

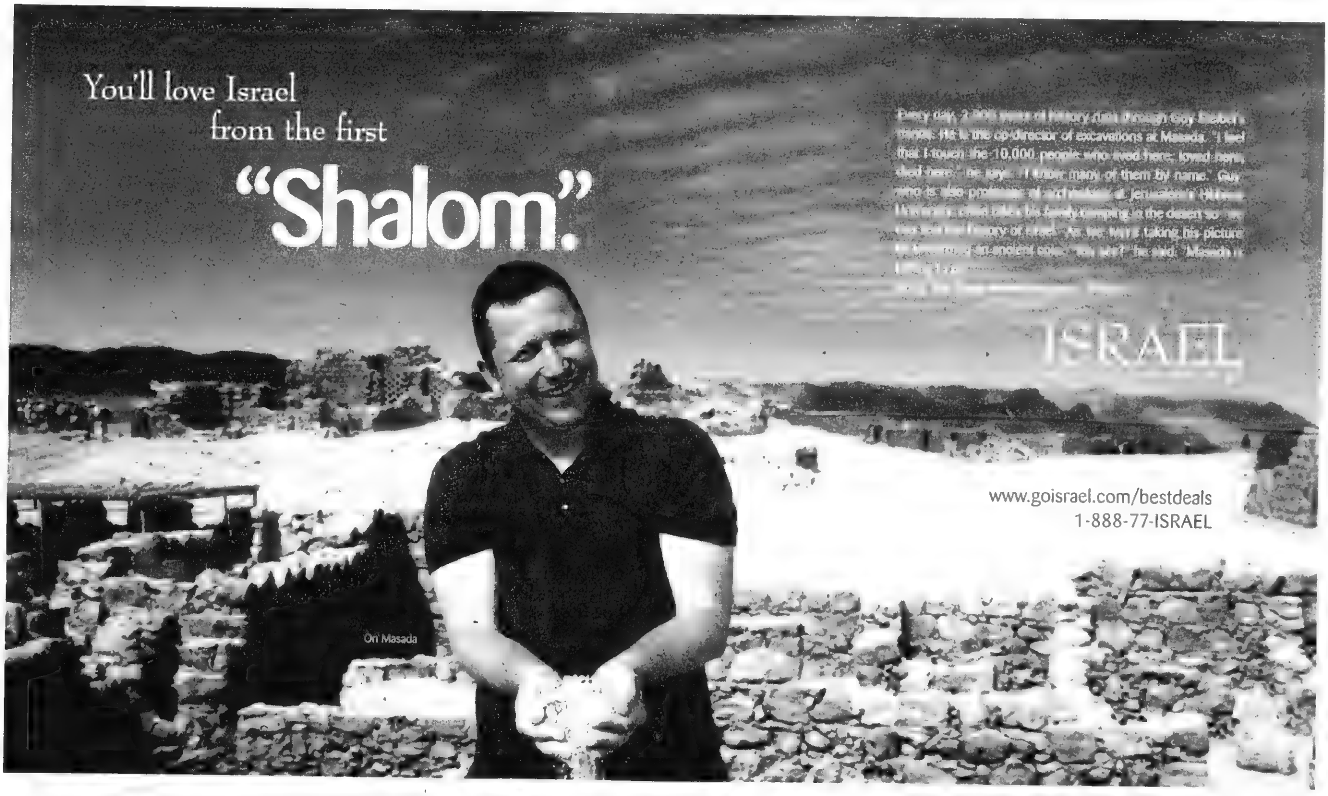
"We both think that Gaza is an integral part of the Palestinian Authority, but it is clear that we cannot accept the violent aggression of the Hamas terror organization which is controlling Gaza and we hope that this situation will change," he said. "We discussed the efforts that need to be made to strengthen the moderate forces within the Palestinian Authority."

Prodi and Olmert both spoke of the need to block Iran from developing nuclear weapons.

"We can never accept a country sworn to Israel's destruction becoming a nuclear power," Olmert said.

"We agree without reservation… Iran must not develop a military nuclear capability," Prodi said.

Iranian President Mahmoud Ahmadinejad has repeatedly called for Israel's destruction. Tehran says its nuclear program is intended to produce energy, not weapons, but Israel and the West don't believe it.



Government to set up tent city for Sudanese refugees near Negev prison

By AMIRAM BARKAT and MIJAL GRINBERG

© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — The Prison Service and Public Security Ministry agreed Monday to establish a tent encampment in the Negev to house refugees from Africa, most of them Sudanese fleeing the fighting in the region.

According to the agreement reached by Public Security Minister Avi Dichter and Prisons Service representative Benny Caniak, the tent city will be set up close to Ketziot Prison in the Negev.

There are approximately 230 refugees from Africa in Israel, 180 of them currently in Be'er Sheva. The Jewish Agency said Sunday that it would fund accommodation for another 54 refugees from Sudan who travelled from Be'er Sheva to Jerusalem to protest outside the Knesset. The group was then returned to the southern city after the Prime Minister's Office stated it would not pay for the asylum seekers' welfare.

The PMO stressed that it would not lodge African refugees in hotels, dormitories or temporary camps, in order to send a message that Israel does not wish to take them in.

Meanwhile, Sudan's interior minister, Al-Zubair Bashir Taha, was quoted Monday as saying Israel is encouraging his country's citizens to immigrate to Israel to tarnish Khartoum's image.

Israel Radio reported that Bashir Taha dubbed the refugee crisis a "melodrama" manufactured by Israel, and threatened legal action against expatriated citizens who attempted to enter Israel.

"It's not clear where they're trying to reach, whether they want to continue from Israel to Europe or America. They know nothing about Israel," Bashir Taha said.

He said some 3,000 Sudanese nationals try to reach Israel annually – 30 per cent from the Darfur region, 40 per cent from the predominantly Christian south and the rest from the mountainous Nubian areas in the north.

The PMO said Sunday that deportation to Egypt is the state's only solution for the African refugees and foreign workers who infiltrated from Egypt, even though some of them are refugees who fled persecution in Sudan's war-torn Darfur region.

According to the PMO, the deportation to Egypt has been delayed so far only because a full list of the refugees has not been compiled.

The Israel Defence Forces has deposited in various southern towns growing numbers of mostly Sudanese and Eritrean refugees it caught illegally infiltrating Israel's border from Egypt, but without assuming responsibility for their welfare.

The erection of a tent city of Sudanese refugees in the Wohl Rose Garden facing the Knesset was averted Sunday, at least temporarily, following an announcement by the PMO that a housing solution has been found.

On Sunday, the Be'er Sheva municipality bused 54 refugees to Jerusalem, among them 15 children and a pregnant woman, and announced that it is demanding that the government assume responsibility for their care. Eighteen refugees arrived in Israel through Sinai a week and a half ago, but 36 others were brought by the army to the Be'er Sheva municipality since then.

The municipality, which relies on the support of philanthropic organizations and whose budget is limited, has threatened to deliver another 180 refugees to Jerusalem.

"So far, the [Be'er Sheva municipality's] cost for hosting [the refugees] has been half a million shekels," the city's spokesperson Amnon Yosef said Sunday. "The Prime Minister's Bureau has promised to give us the funds, but so far they have not done so."

The PMO and the Social Affairs Ministry announced on Sunday that the refugees would be hosted at the Beit Yatziv hostel in Be'er Sheva. According Darfur Refugee Council chair Eitan Schwartz, the government has promised to pay for the cost of their stay there for one night.

The PMO, however, denied claims it had pledged to arrange and finance accommodations for Sudanese refugees who were bused to Jerusalem from Be'er Sheva to protest the lack of government funding for the welfare of African asylum seekers.

No arrangements had been co-ordinated for the refugees at the Beit Yatziv guest house or at any other hotel in the city. But a temporary solution was found for the refugees.

The Jewish Agency agreed to house the refugees at a dormitory near the western Negev city of Sderot. They will be provided for for 10 days, at the behest of the PMO.

Jewish Agency chair Ze'ev Bielsky said that "this is a humanitarian act of helping people in need."

When they arrived in Jerusalem, local residents brought food for the refugees, as did members of Mair Panim, a philanthropic organization.

Jerusalem Mayor Uri Lupolianski instructed medical teams and social workers to help the refugees.

The Be'er Sheva municipality announced it will no longer deal with the refugees, and any support they receive should come from the government.

In Eilat, a community of 400 Sudanese refugees and their children are participating in activities being organized by the youth movement Noar Haoved Vehalomed. Many of the parents work in the hotels in the city, and the programs include Hebrew classes for the adults and games and other activities for the children.

Israel Briefs

Israel hits Hamas in Gaza

Israeli forces killed 11 Palestinian gunmen in Gaza, including at least nine Hamas members. Commandos backed by tanks raided the village of Maghazi in the central Gaza Strip early last Thursday, exchanging fire with local Hamas militiamen. Two Israeli soldiers were reported wounded.

Israelis want Jewish PM

Most Israelis would support legislation requiring that the prime minister be Jewish, a poll found. According to a survey by the Israel office of the Friedrich Naumann Foundation policy institute published last week, 64 per cent of Israelis would welcome such a law, 12 per cent would reluctantly accept it as necessary, and 22 per cent would oppose it. The idea found surprisingly strong minority support – 31 per cent among Israeli Arabs. The poll also found that 97 per cent of citizens believe interracial tolerance is important and 77 per cent want equal rights for all ethnic groups. The survey had 609 respondents and a 4.1 per cent margin of error.

Livni meets Moroccan FM

Israel and Morocco held bilateral talks. Israeli Foreign Minister Tzipi Livni met her Moroccan counterpart, Mohamed Benaissa, in Paris on July 4, the first high-level contacts between the countries in four years. Morocco established diplomatic relations with Israel in 1993 but, along with other moderate Arab states, scaled back the ties in response to the eruption of Palestinian violence in 2000. After the meeting, Livni told reporters that Jerusalem and Rabat had "common interests" in seeing progress in Israeli-Arab peacemaking.

Naches pays off

Doting grandparents will be cared for by their grown-up grandchildren, an Israeli study has found. Researchers at Haifa University's school of social work, having monitored 216 pairs of grandchildren and their grandparents, reported that there was a definite "quid pro quo" element in the emotional interaction between the two groups. "The study results reveal that not only did grandchildren who were taken care of by their grandparents express a desire to help, they were actually very involved in helping with day-to-day things like transportation, shopping, nursing care, emotional support and initiating visits," the university said. While granddaughters tend to express greater desire than their brothers to aid their grandparents, in actuality, the sexes are equally helpful, researchers found. They urged families to treat grandchildren as a key factor in caring for elders.

Record N.A. aliyah

A 33-year high in immigration from North America is expected in 2007, with some 3,500 Americans and Canadians expected to move to Israel this year, according to a report released by Nefesh B'Nefesh last week. The organization, which helps new arrivals to make their new home in Israel via monetary aid and other assistance, said there has been an 80 per cent rise in immigration from the United States and Canada since 2001, when Nefesh B'Nefesh began operating. This year's forecast is a 10 per cent jump over the 3,200 North Americans who immigrated last year.

Ethiopian-Israeli rabbi is a light unto his people

By BATSHEVA POMERANTZ
IPS

Rabbi Sharon Shalom (formerly Zaude Taspei), a university lecturer and leader in Israel's Ethiopian community, experienced a strong connection to Jerusalem as a child.

"Everything was about Jerusalem. A stork flying in the sky was obviously flying there. As a seven-year-old, I asked my grandfather to show me where Jerusalem was. He pointed in the general direction. I set out in that direction and was lost for three days.

Feature

"As a boy, I thought that Jerusalem was lined with gold. I pictured a country flowing with milk and honey where everyone is Jewish," says Rabbi Shalom, 33, whose lectures about the history and tradition of the Beta Israel (Jews of Ethiopian origin), their yearning for Jerusalem and the challenges they face in Israel fascinate audiences in Israel and abroad.

In early 1980, with famine, disease and oppression rampant in Ethiopia, the clandestine rescue of Ethiopian Jews was high on Israel's agenda.

"I remember a Jewish Agency emissary coming to our village," Rabbi Shalom says. "We called him faranji, stranger, but we wanted to meet with him since he was a Jew from Jerusalem."

In 1981, Taspei and his family left their village in the Tigre region of Ethiopia for Israel and trekked for over two months to Sudan. Exposed to bandits, hunger and disease, they thought they would shortly reach Jerusalem. Some Beta Israel, however, remained in the Sudanese refugee camps for up to six years.

With the child mortality rate in the camps extremely high, a number of parents made the heartrending decision to send their children alone to Israel. In 1982, eight-year-old Taspei, his family's firstborn, arrived in Israel on his own as part of the Bat Galim operation of the Israeli navy's commando unit.

Rabbi Sharon Shalom

"We kissed the ground of the Land of Israel with great excitement," Rabbi Sharon says. "We felt we had come home. This was the realization of a dream, because we had felt like strangers in Ethiopia."

Zaude was renamed Sharon by the authorities and sent to a children's home in Afula. Shortly afterward, he received word that his parents had died. For two years, he believed he was an orphan, until one day the dormitory director informed him that his parents were alive and well in Israel.

"When I met my parents and brothers after their aliyah, I felt as if they had returned from the dead!"

His parents moved to Kiryat Gat in the south, where they live today, not far from Rabbi Shalom and his family.

Since very few Ethiopians lived in Israel at the time, Rabbi Shalom felt as if people were always looking at him. "I felt different, just as I had in Ethiopia."

Over the years, however, Rabbi Shalom learned to take curious stares in his stride. "One must flow with the current and deal with it in a positive way. It is a given in Israel that the veterans feel superior to the newcomers, in every wave of immigration. Although it was hard to bridge the gap between the dream of Jerusalem and the reality, it was still easier for me than for the older people."

Rabbi Shalom studied at the yeshiva high school in Merkaz Shapira and eventually became a regular guest at the home of the Israeli-born dormitory director, Rabbi Aryeh Shalom.

"By being allowed into his home, my perspective changed. Ethiopian youth worry about doing things wrongly compared to Israelis. They think their homes are very different. But once you go into Israeli homes you realize this isn't true."

Rabbi Sharon Shalom served as an officer in an elite army unit (among the first Ethiopian officers in the Israel Defence Forces), combining his army service with yeshiva studies. He later studied education and counselling at various colleges and Talmud at Bar-Ilan University, and became the first Israeli of Ethiopian descent to teach at the university and one of the first Ethiopian-Israelis to be ordained by the chief rabbinate of the State of Israel.

He and his wife, Avital, a social worker who made aliyah from Switzerland as a child, have two sons.

"Sometimes young women claim they're looking to marry an Ethiopian because they're nice. I explain to them that an Ethiopian is not a project but a person," she says.

Rabbi Shalom has lectured abroad for the organization Israel at Heart, which advocates on behalf of the Jewish state. He also lectures for organizations that helped him as a youth, including Emunah Women (which ran the children's home in Afula where he spent his first years in Israel) and World Mizrachi.

His lectures and courses at Bar-Ilan University and at various colleges in Jerusalem aim to shatter the stereotype of Ethiopian immigrants.

"Their image is often negative, especially on an emotional level. They're presented as negative and needy. I try to throw light on the community and highlight its positive aspects."

It was, for example, the only Jewish community since the destruction of the Second Temple to have its own Jewish monarch. In addition, since it was isolated from the Jewish world for many centuries, it is the only community with customs that date back to pre-talmudic times. Rabbi Shalom researched the circumcision customs of the community for his MA thesis at Bar-Ilan. He is now embarking on his doctoral thesis, which will research additional ancient customs.

In rural Ethiopia, the kes, or spiritual leader, was prominent. In Israel, however, this role has somewhat diminished, especially among younger Ethiopians. Rabbi Shalom feels strongly that a rabbinical or spiritual leadership needs to be developed for the community. To this end, he counsels students who are studying at the Or M'Ofir program at Yeshiva Or Etzion in Merkaz Shapira, which enables young Ethiopians to participate in a pre-army preparatory program followed by military service and then yeshiva study towards certification as teachers and rabbis in the Ethiopian community.

"These young leaders will help Ethiopians integrate into Israeli society while preserving their traditional customs, which they have either lost or abandoned. After all, the traditions of the Beta Israel can only enrich the Jewish people."

Another U.K. union calls for boycott

By HAIM BIOR
© Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

LONDON — Britain's Transport and General Workers' Union (TGWU) has called upon its 800,000 members to boycott Israeli-made products because of what they call Israel's "criminal policies in Palestinian territories."

The decision to call for a boycott, reached at a union conference in Brighton on Sunday, is declarative and does not include concrete steps to implement the boycott.

The TGWU is the second British union to call for such a boycott of Israel this year. Last month, the British public services union, UNISON, also urged its members to refrain from purchasing Israeli products, basing the call on Israel's "criminal behaviour in the territories" and its responsibility for the Second Lebanon War.

In addition, Britain's University and College Union called upon its members earlier this year to consider an academic boycott of Israel, which would include withholding funding for research projects conducted by Israeli professors and preventing Israeli lecturers from participating in seminars.

In the last six months, the public services union in Ontario, Canada, proposed a similar anti-Israel boycott, as did several professional unions in South Africa.

Histadrut International's activities director Avital Shapira said Sunday that the Israeli labour federation views the TGWU's boycott call seriously. According to Shapira, the Histadrut has decided not to co-operate with the British unions when they ask for help.

The British Embassy in Israel also issued a response Sunday: "The British government opposes boycotts of any kind. The boycott declared by the Transport and General Workers' Union will not harm the growing commercial relations between the two countries," the statement said.

Parliamentarians from 56 countries have rejected the union call for boycott, and the British academic boycott, in particular.

An announcement made Sunday at the conference of the Commission on Security and Co-operation in Europe (CSCE) in Kiev stated that the gathering "expresses its concern at all attempts to target Israeli institutions and individuals for boycotts, divestments and sanctions."

Labor MK Collette Avital, who was attending the conference as an observer, said she was surprised by the large majority that supported that motion.

Living Jewish in Africa

By MARCIE SOMERS
Special to The CJN

NAIROBI — The Jewish Diaspora comprises many countries, so it came as no surprise while I was travelling through East Africa recently to discover a rich and diverse culture has existed here for more than a century.

According to Dr. David Silverstein, rosh kehillah and president of the Nairobi Hebrew Congregation in Nairobi, East African Jewry extends through Zambia, Ethiopia, Zimbabwe, Congo, Tanzania, Kenya and Uganda.

However, the hub for religious observance and cultural activity is in the Nairobi Hebrew Congregation (NHC) in Kenya, with its vibrant community, its religious services, and social, cultural and educational events; not to mention its rich history.

The first Jewish settlers arrived in Kenya in 1903. From there, the community grew to include Jewish immigrants from around the world of Sephardi and Ashkenazi descent. Settlers came from countries as diverse as Russia, Latvia, Lithuania, Poland, Romania, Czechoslovakia, Germany, England, Canada, the United States, Israel, Yemen, Iraq, India and South Africa.

At its peak the community had more than 400 families. There were functioning synagogues in Nairobi and Nakuru and informal services were conducted in Mombassa and Kitale. However, in 1952 when Kenya became independent, many left for Israel, South Africa and the United States, and the once-thriving community was greatly reduced. Today, the Nairobi congregation has 100 families. The synagogue in Nakuru is gone, and informal services aren't held in Mombassa or Kitale. Yet despite the isolation and its size, the Kenyan Jewish community remains a vibrant one.

Barbara Steenstrup, who grew up in Baltimore and came to Kenya in 1986, loves the richness of the community and the Nairobi Hebrew Congregation (NHC). "One of the aspects of the NHC that I like most is its diversity," she says. "During a service, one observes Ashkenazi and Sephardic practices and melodies, standing and sitting for different portions. All the various forms of observance, Jewish practice and tradition all come together.

"Another thing I love are the discussions. Often after services or at Shabbat dinners, conversations revolve around comparisons of practice. The current Israeli ambassador, Emanuel Seri, holds discussions after Saturday morning services, and others gather for less structured conversation over cake, coffee and tea."

Silverstein came to Kenya in 1974 as a recent graduate from medical school. Originally, he came for the adventure. He says that the isolation of the Jewish community there brings people together. "Being a small community and by virtue of being an isolated one, I find that it brings a special attachment to the synagogue and the community itself.

"You often find people who had no Jewish identity back home become actively involved, from attending services every Friday night to participating in communal seders."

While living in Africa might create some challenges for the observant – there are no kosher restaurants and kosher meat has to be imported from South Africa – Steenstrup believes that one can fulfil the basic tenets of Judaism by performing mitzvot and by ethical behaviour.

"Personally, I don't find it difficult at all to follow the various rituals and observances," she says. "Despite not having a rabbi, the NHC maintains regular Jewish services all year round, services are held every Friday evening and Shabbat morning and all High Holy Days.

"The community holds an annual community Seder and publishes a magazine, Shelanu, in both Hebrew and English to coincide with Rosh Hashanah/Yom Kippur, Chanukah and Passover, so I don't feel like I'm missing out on anything. I find it very easy to live a Jewish life in Africa."

Silverstein adds that he and some community members are actively involved with the African Jewish Congress, which is the co-ordinating body that links the smaller Jewish communities in sub-Saharan Africa and helps them retain their links with world Jewry. "As a member of this organization, we meet yearly, where we're able to network with other Jews from all over Africa and discuss how we can provide our Jewish community in Kenya with a viable and vibrant Jewish spiritual life."

According to both Silverstein and Steenstrup, relations with their African counterparts are harmonious. Despite the terrorist attack in 2002 when three Israeli tourists as well as 12 locals were killed at the Israeli-owned Paradise Hotel in Mombassa, both have encountered little, if any, anti-Semitism.

"Many Africans are extremely positive when they hear I'm Jewish. As there is a wide knowledge of both the Old and New Testament," says Steenstrup. "Occasionally, there are anti-Semitic commentaries and letters to the editor in the press, but on the whole I'm not worried."

Silverstein concurs. "There are times when I get a bit uneasy, such as when the American Embassy was bombed by Al Qaeda in 1998. If anything, I'm worry more about it from an anti-Israeli perspective, but on the whole I'm quite comfortable being Jewish in Africa," he says.

"I came to Kenya in 1974 and haven't looked back. I love the community in which I live and wouldn't give it up for anything."

Sculptor's history is as unique as his art

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

The fruits of Andrew Benyei's labour stare at him daily.

The Toronto sculptor's mixed media works are displayed in his studio, which doubles as his home with his wife, Judie.

The Kiss, a sculpture of a man and woman whose bodies are splayed acrobatically and who are held together only by their mouths, sits in his dining room. Graham, a naked man floating in a bathtub, relaxes beside his couch. Various sculptures of long-in-the-tooth businesspeople stand around his sitting room. Benyei also paints, and most walls are adorned with paintings or mounted sculptures.

"I tend to sculpt what I feel and paint what I see," Benyei said.

"My art is representational, which means it is what you see. All of my sculptures are of people. Many of them look at relationships," he said.

Benyei's preferred medium is clay, and he also works with fibreglass, bronze and resin. The self-described "sculptor who paints" also paints many of his sculptures, an age-old technique that is not common in contemporary pieces.

In addition to people, Benyei also sculpts pigs, whose individuality, he said, makes them metaphors for humankind.

Benyei has many sculptures that represent the the white-collar business world, including a woman struggling to break through a glass ceiling. That world was Benyei's when he was an engineer and business administrator before he made his drastic career shift in 1990.

"I was very unhappy with what I was doing and something had to be done," Benyei said. "I spent almost 20 years carrying a briefcase and climbing the corporate ladder. I walked away and became a full-time artist."

The change wasn't easy, but said he loves his current work and would never go back to the corporate model.

Benyei recalled his early days painting in Kensington Market. When he needed a washroom, he said, he used a dirty public facility – and he had to step over people lying on the ground to reach it.

"I'm standing there thinking, 'A week ago I was on the 20th floor of a building and had a granite washroom – what am I doing here?'"

The Hungarian-born artist has a history as singular as his own journey and artwork.

His father, Laszlo "Laci" Antal Benyei, was a Catholic Hungarian born in 1919. Laci met Eva Kerty, a Jew, at a swimming pool during World War II, and they fell in love. Kerty's family home was destroyed by an air raid and they had to move to a ghetto in Ujpest, the Budapest suburb where they lived.

Laci moved Kerty to several different locations after that to keep her safe before the two married, although Kerty used a false name and dyed her hair blonde to hide her Jewishness.

During the Holocaust, Laci also took Kerty's six-year-old nephew, Biro Ivstan (now Biran Haim), into his home in order to save him, and in 1944, found a safe-house for Kerty's parents and sister.

"I think it was just the right thing to do," Andrew said of his father's actions. "It wasn't out of heroism or anything. The things that were happening just weren't right."

After the war, the couple married legally and had Andrew. Four years later, Laci died at the age of 34, and Andrew never knew his father.

Andrew and Kerty immigrated to Toronto when Andrew was seven. Kerty converted to Catholicism after the war, and Andrew Benyei doesn't consider himself religious.

"I see myself as being brought up Catholic, but I don't believe in all that," he said. "I saw too much hypocrisy [in religion]. I am comfortable in both environments," he said of Catholicism and Judaism, noting that Haim and the rest of Kerty's family made aliyah to Israel after the war.

In 2002, Laci was honoured posthumously with a Righteous Among the Nations medal from Yad Vashem, through the Israeli consul, Zehavit Ben Hillel. Benyei accepted the medal on behalf of his father.

Like his son, Laci was an engineer with an artistic flair.

"In a way, I broke out of my mould as well," Benyei said, comparing his career shift to Laci's marriage outside his faith. "In a way, there's that parallel."

Hezbollah probed and dissected

Hezbollah* by Augustus Richard Norton, Princeton University Press.

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hezbollah, the Lebanese Shiite militia and political party formed in the wake of Israel's 1982 invasion of Lebanon, has left a deep imprint in the Middle East.

Long before fighting Israel in a 34-day war that erupted exactly a year ago in Lebanon, Hezbollah was an important player, having been instrumental in the departure of U.S. and Israeli forces from Lebanon.

Augustus Richard Norton, an American academic and former U.S. army officer, has studied that Islamic fundamentalist organization since its formation. And now, in Hezbollah, published by Princeton University Press, he offers a cogent analysis of its emergence and impact on Lebanese politics.

Augustus Richard Norton

In a view shared by most observers, including Israeli Defence Minister Ehud Barak, Hezbollah emerged after Israel invaded Lebanon. "When we entered Lebanon… there was no Hezbollah," he quotes Barak as saying. "We were accepted with perfumed rice and flowers by the Shia in the south. It was our presence that created Hezbollah."

Before Hezbollah appeared on the scene, Amal, a militia led by Nabih Berri, was the chief power broker in the Shiite community. Syria, Lebanon's big brother, if you will, regarded Amal as a mechanism for checking the Palestinians in Lebanon.

But after Berri supported the signing of a peace treaty between Israel and Lebanon in the aftermath of the 1982 war, a treaty that was never consummated, Syria shifted part of its support to Hezbollah as a counterweight to Amal, observes Norton.

Amal and Hezbollah ultimately came to blows, ostensibly over the kidnapping of an American marine colonel attached to UNIFIL, the United Nations peacekeeping force in southern Lebanon.

In battles waged in the southern suburbs of Beirut in 1988, Hezbollah defeated Amal and thus became the leading representative of the Shiites in Lebanon.

Prior to these skirmishes, Hezbollah – a "stalking horse for Iranian interests," says Norton – made its mark by organizing attacks against the Israeli army occupying southern Lebanon. Various Lebanese groups, including Amal, joined forces with Hezbollah to end the occupation, but by the 1990s, Hezbollah was carrying out the lion's share of such raids in Israel's self-declared security zone. Norton adds that Hezbollah operations mainly targeted Israeli soldiers and the South Lebanon Army, a surrogate force established, financed and trained by Israel and led by Saad Haddad, a former Lebanese army officer.

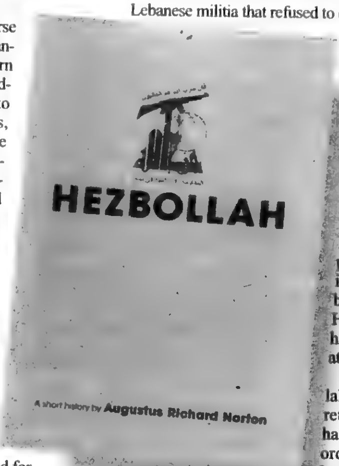
Norton believes that Hezbollah's goal went beyond forcing Israel out of Lebanon. "The ultimate objective was to destroy Israel and liberate Palestine," he writes. In this connection, Hezbollah has formed close ties with various Palestinian groups, from Hamas to Islamic Jihad, opposed to Israel's existence.

Apart from attacking Israel, Hezbollah took aim at American and French peacekeepers in Lebanon, kidnapped foreigners, including the American journalist Terry Anderson, and masterminded the 1985 hijacking of TWA flight 847.

In addition, Hezbollah exported terrorism.

Shortly after Israel killed Hezbollah's secretary general, Abbas Musawi, Hezbollah operative Imad Mughniyeh, aided by Iranian intelligence agents, bombed the Israeli embassy in Argentina.

This was followed, two years later in 1994, by the bombing of a Jewish community centre in Buenos Aires that Norton mistakenly describes as an "Israeli association." Last year, Argentina issued warrants for the arrest of, among others, Iran's former president and foreign minister.



Norton reminds readers that Hezbollah was the only Lebanese militia that refused to disarm under the terms of the 1990 Taif agreement, which ended the 15-year civil war in Lebanon.

Hezbollah's justification for flouting the accord was that it was the sole credible force for defending Lebanon. But this was merely a ruse. With Israel's unilateral pullout from Lebanon in May 2000, ratified by the United Nations, Hezbollah no longer had a valid excuse to attack the Israeli army.

To Hassan Nasrallah, Hezbollah's secretary general, this hardly mattered. He ordered raids against Israeli patrols in a sliver of land known as Shebaa Farms, which Israel captured from Syria during the Six Day War. In contradiction to a UN ruling, he considered Shebaa Farms as sovereign Lebanese territory. These periodic cross-border attacks claimed the lives of 17 Israeli soldiers in a six-year period from 2000 onward.

Norton points out that these raids, rather than being universally popular in Lebanon, aroused indignation in certain Lebanese quarters. In a scathing piece in an-Nahar, one of Lebanon's leading dailies, publisher Gibran Tueni wrote: "Who authorized Nasrallah to represent all the Lebanese, to make decisions for them and to embroil them in something they don't want to be embroiled in?"

In this vein, Lebanese figures such as Tueni demanded Hezbollah's disarmament. Hezbollah ignored these pleas and periodically fired rockets into Israel. In response, Israel hit back. Chronicling these tit-for-tat exchanges, Norton says, "Both sides were clearly itching for a fight."

On July 12, 2006, Hezbollah ambushed a motorized Israeli patrol in the Galilee, killing three soldiers and capturing two others. The fighting escalated, and within hours, the second war in Lebanon broke out.

As Norton states, Hezbollah expected a perfunctory Israeli reprisal but got a war instead. "Hezbollah had made a major miscalculation." Yet, contrary to Israel's expectations, Hezbollah proved exceedingly resilient.

In assessing the effects of the war, Norton says that Hezbollah's show of military strength galvanized the Palestinians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, as well as the Shiites in Iraq.

The war, an economic calamity for Lebanon, prompted open questioning of Hezbollah's role in starting it and split Lebanon into two warring camps. Many Sunnis, Druze and Christians accused Hezbollah of needlessly exposing the country to Israel's wrath and of being an agent of both Syria and Iran. Shiites, however, rallied behind Hezbollah.

According to Norton, Hezbollah has been using the war to upgrade its status in the Muslim world and change the delicate balance of power of Lebanon's sectarian government in its favour.

"The July war," he writes in a dispassionate tone, "threw a bomb into Lebanese politics."

In his judgment, Hezbollah is fated to play a continuing and pivotal role in Lebanon. "And, one hopes, a constructive one," he adds.

Yet it remains to be seen, given Hezbollah's undying and visceral animosity toward Israel, whether this in fact will be the case.

SUMMER LITERARY COLUMN PART 2: HARRY POLLOCK, JOYCEAN SCHOLAR

How does a man with no university education become a world authority in the life and works of Irish writer James Joyce?

Harry Pollock

Harry Pollock of Toronto says he first became interested in Joyce for the same reason many others of his generation did – "because they wanted to read the erotic parts in Ulysses – in the course of which I discovered the other parts of the book," he says.

Pollock, who recently celebrated his 87th birthday and the publication of his third novel, spent the first 20 years of his career in advertising. Then, in 1969, York University's Stong College hired the Harbord Collegiate graduate to teach a course on Joyce to first-year students. He quickly left the business world and never looked back. He went on to teach Anglo-Irish literature and creative writing at York, which awarded him an honorary degree in 1995; he has also taught a course on English and Irish playwrights at McMaster University.

Having founded Toronto's James Joyce Society in 1964, he organized numerous influential Joycean events and international symposia, including several that featured Marshall McLuhan as a guest speaker. The renowned media guru "was an avid Joycean and his references were full of Joyceana," Pollock recalls of McLuhan. "He was excited about Finnegan's Wake's style and its puns and word play."

Born in Opatov, Poland, in 1920, Pollock was long involved in theatre and had early experience here with a local Jewish theatre associated with the Farband; he interviewed Yiddish actors, including Jacob Ben Ami and Maurice Schwartz, for its newspaper. He made numerous radio documentaries for the CBC and staged notable theatrical productions, including Ulysses in Nighttown at the Poor Alex Theatre in 1966, in which he himself took the role of Joyce's Jewish protagonist, Leopold Bloom.

Pollock's passion for Joyce – as well as Samuel Beckett and Gustave Flaubert, other writers he idolizes – was famously infectious.

"I put Joyce together with Flaubert," he says. "Flaubert said he would like, in his writing, to write without one unnecessary word, without one unnecessary adjective. Joyce was influenced by Flaubert to a degree. You can see that on any page in Ulysses, even in the first sentence" – and here he recites the opening passage by heart: "Stately plump Buck Mulligan came from the stairhead…"

The founding president of Temple Sinai, Pollock also directed plays there and taught a drama class at Holy Blossom Temple for 10 years. He was invited to give a series of lectures on Joyce in Japan, and has variously met, corresponded with, and befriended many of Joyce's close associates; the list includes Samuel Beckett and Morris Ernst, the American lawyer who, in a landmark court case in 1933, defended Ulysses against charges of immorality. "He gave me his whole docket of briefs that he used to fight the case," recalls Pollock, who has donated his own important collection of Joycean papers and memorabilia to the York Archives.

Becoming an expert in the works of the writer who perfected the modern stream-of-consciousness literary technique and invested prose with a new level of pun and metaphor, has required Pollock to become knowledgeable in Irish history, Catholic symbolism, the street geography of Dublin and diverse other subjects. Despite Joyce's preoccupation with Catholicism, there was much of Jewish provenance in the writer's world, beginning with his famous hero Leopold Bloom, a character based on the mythological figure Odysseus. Bloom's own fictional odyssey unfolds over a weekend in Dublin and is the substance of the central work in the Joycean canon.

"Joyce's portrait of Bloom was an amalgam of a number of Jews that Joyce knew in Trieste [Italy], where he spent a good number of years writing Ulysses," Pollock explains. "Bloom comes out of it as the only decent human being in the book." Despite the rampant anti-Semitism of his day, Joyce's most important friends and editors were Jewish, and he acquired a Jewish grandson in 1932, thanks to his son Giorgio's brief marriage to Helen Kastor Fleischmann, a Jewish New Yorker.

Besides providing the substance of Pollock's scholarship, Joyce has also been a major influence on his fiction – or "faction" as he calls it – not only for his latest book, Anna's Journal (Mosaic Press), but also for the two previous novels in what is now a trilogy: Gabriel (1975) and Max (1997). In the new novel, Pollock brings his characters forward from the 1940s into the '70s as they explore some intimate details in the life and times of – guess who? – James Joyce.

Besides its Jewish characters, the plot has numerous Jewish threads, some involving the founding of the State of Israel. Pollock, however, seems reticent to sum up the story. "It's an odyssey, if you will allow me to escape that easily," he says.

With a bit more persistent questioning, he admits to a central concern "with style over content" – another point of similarity with his chief literary idol. "But even though style is my persistent goal, there's got to be content," he acknowledges. "Something's got to happen. But that doesn't mean earthshaking activities. What happens in the mind of a human being is very important to me." (As it was with Joyce.)

A North York resident who lost his wife five years ago, Pollock still enjoys turning on new readers to Joyce, and offers a suggestion to those picking up Ulysses for the first time. "The only bit of advice I have is, get ready to consider it a long-term project… It has to be studied."

A published poet whose collection The He and the She of It appeared in 1991, he has also worn the professional hats of a public relations director, journalist, scriptwriter, TV producer, cultural critic, actor and playwright. Ultimately, in his quest for information, he followed Joyce's trail from Dublin to Paris to Trieste. Following his intellectual passions has brought him a considerable international reputation, and all because his mental attitude likely parallelled that in the famous closing phrase of Ulysses – "yes I said yes I will Yes."

Independent film/TV producer has several hits

Daniel Iron produced Sarah Polley's Away From Her

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It isn't easy being an independent film and television producer in Canada, where the market is relatively small.

Despite the odds, Daniel Iron has succeeded, though he admits that things can be precarious.

Iron, the 43-year-old founder of Toronto-based Foundry Films, has established himself with a succession of Canadian hits ranging from Sarah Polley's Away from Her to François Girard's The Red Violin.

For 11 years, Iron was one of the principals of Rhombus Media, where he produced or co-produced documentaries such as Beethoven's Hair and The Music of Harold Arlen, the TV series Slings and Arrows, and the films Last Night (directed by Don McKellar) and Manufactured Landscapes.

Daniel Iron

He left Rhombus Media in 2004 to strike out on his own. "It was time," he said, explaining that he craved full control over his projects.

Three years on, Iron – a lawyer by training – has several television productions and films to his credit, from the CBC comedy series Northern Town, which lasted for one season, to Away from Her, which has earned about $3.5 million in box office receipts in Canada and the United States so far.

Away from Her, adopted from an Alice Munro short story and made with a $4.5 million budget, has been sold to more than 100 countries, including Israel, and may be screened at the Jerusalem Film Festival in July.

An Osgoode Hall Law School graduate, he began working on Away from Her about four years ago, when Polley expressed an interest in buying the rights and writing a screenplay.

"I've known Sarah for years and years," he said. "I produced her first short film nine years ago."

Away from Her, which was co-produced by Jennifer Weiss and Simone Urdl, has enjoyed a measure of success for several reasons, he said. "It's an unusual love story, and the quality of the material is great. As for the cast, Julie Christie, the female lead, is in her first film in many years. Viewers find it moving, emotional and personal. It hits a chord."

Iron hopes to work with Polley again. "We have a close relationship, but she's concentrating on acting right now."

In general, Iron chooses projects on the basis of two criteria.

He likes films with a literary bent and enjoys working with directors and actors whom he admires and relates to.

"That's the joy of the job," he said in a reference to his favourite people in the industry.

Currently, Iron is working to develop The Bang Bang Club, which turns on the so-called township wars in South Africa during the 1980s. "We're in the process of raising money for it."

He is also in the midst of shooting a documentary on lightning. "We're looking at it from a metaphysical point of view," he said. "It's about fate and chance."

As it happens, chance is what an independent producer like Iron has to take into account when he considers a project.

Due to the vicissitudes of public taste, he never really knows what will fly. As a result, half of his projects wither on the vine, never seeing the light of day. Knowing this, Iron keeps a wide range of projects on the back-burner.

In taking on a project, he faces a multitude of challenges.

Since only about 10 films are made in Canada annually, financing can be a formidable problem.

With this in mind, Iron turns to actors with star appeal who can attract an audience.

Finding a film a good distribution deal is also challenging. Yet at the end of the day, some films are easier to sell than others.

Having said that, Iron acknowledged that Canadian films are usually at a disadvantage when competing against Hollywood blockbusters.

Yet a smart producer can win if he plays his cards right. Iron saw to it that Away from Her would open on the same day as Spider Man. Perverse? Not actually. "We provided a viable alternative to filmgoers, and in this case, the strategy worked."

Iron learned the business at Rhombus Media after a five-year stint as legal counsel at Telefilm Canada.

"I didn't ever really want to work for a Bay Street law firm, where I never belonged," he said.

Unlike some Canadians in his position, he has not considered a career in Hollywood.

"The advantage of working in Canada is that you can produce what you want," said Iron, whose father Larry is a real estate lawyer and whose mother Gilda is a retired United Synagogue Day School principal.

"And in Canada, there is less pressure to conform to a model," he added. "Anyway, I like Toronto and Canada."

Just For Laughs cancels Bar Mitzvah Show

By MITCHELL SCHNURBACH
Special to The CJN

When the Montreal Just For Laughs Festival returned on July 8 for its 25th anniversary edition, it was without the the popular Bar Mitzvah Show.

"We unfortunately had to cut out some of the more popular annual shows in order to make room for one-time-only anniversary events," Robbie Praw, a talent programmer for the festival, said.

The Bar Mitzvah Show's usual venue, Club Soda, will instead feature a whopping 15 editions of The Nasty Show, traditionally the most popular small-venue English-language event of the festival. In previous years, it ran only five times.

During its 11-year run, The Bar Mitzvah Show featured performances from established and emerging Jewish comics.

What differentiated it from some of the other ethnically themed shows of the festival was the diversity of topics brought forth by the comedians.

According to some industry insiders, the paucity of specific Jewish humour in The Bar Mitzvah Show could be one of the reasons it is no longer part of the festival.

The standup routines in the show were not necessarily devoted strictly to Jewish humour, but often ran the gamut from politics to observational humour. Most of the other themed shows, such as Wiseguys and Queer Comics, feature comedians with acts that better reflect their shows' billing.

Jewish comedians tend to focus their material on topics with wide-ranging mass-market appeal, and it was quite difficult to find comics who make Judaism the focal point of their acts.

Earlier in their careers, Jewish comedians such as Jerry Seinfeld, Billy Crystal and Larry David never featured overtly Jewish themes.

The disappearance of The Bar Mitzvah Show does not mean that the 2007 Just For Laughs Festival will be devoid of Jewish talent or content.

In fact, Howie Mandel and William Shatner will be hosting galas at this year's event.

Tickets to see Mandel, a longtime standup comic and currently host of the popular game shows Deal or No Deal and Deal or No Deal Canada, were in such high demand that organizers brought him in to host two galas.

Other popular Jewish comedians – Seth Green, Lewis Black and local favorite, Joey Elias – will appear at various shows throughout the festival. Black and Mandel will also be hosting shows at the first annual Toronto component of the festival later this month.

Praw did offer assurances that The Bar Mitzvah Show, or some other incarnation of it, may return in the future. "We have certainly not closed the door on The Bar Mitzvah Show or some other type of event featuring comedians from the Jewish community," he said.

In the meantime, this year's festival offers plenty of comedy for everyone to enjoy.

The Montreal Just For Laughs Festival runs to July 29, with English shows taking place from July 12 to 22 at numerous venues throughout the city.

Toronto shows run from July 26 to 28 at Massey Hall.

Heart disease study seeks patients

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

A new study seeks to determine the efficacy of chelation in the treatment of heart disease.

Dr. Shmuel Bergman is a Canadian investigator in the U.S.-based Trial to Assess Chelation Therapy (TACT). TACT is funded by the American National Institutes of Health (an agency of the U.S. Department of Health) and has about 150 centres across North America.

Bergman is the medical director of the Toronto-based Longevity Healthy Aging Research Group. His clinic has been performing chelation therapy since 1997.

He said heavy metals in the blood, such as lead, mercury, cadmium and arsenic, can cause damage to blood vessels. The study seeks to determine whether chelation is effective in decreasing heart and cardiovascular problems.

> Study seeks to determine whether chelation is effective in decreasing heart and cardiovascular problems

Chelation is an alternative therapy. Patients receive intravenous infusions of ethylenediamine tetraacetic acid, commonly known as EDTA. Bergman said EDTA bonds to heavy metals in the blood, and the complex is excreted by the body. Most cardiologists have not accepted it as a treatment for heart disease.

"I certainly don't advise my patients to have chelation therapy, because there is no evidence to support it," said cardiologist Dr. Jim Stone, clinical professor of medicine at the University of Calgary.

Stone supports further research, however, and was the principal Canadian investigator of the TACT trial before the decision was made to use only chelationists on the research team, as a result of funding cuts.

While he is now unaffiliated with the TACT trial, Stone was involved in the PATCH trial, a smaller chelation study performed by the University of Calgary between 1996 and 2000. Stone said PATCH was the first chelation study that clinical scientists could have considered to be done well. Its findings were neutral.

"It is great that they're taking a rigorous look at chelation, but for now, our position holds," said Jane-Diane Fraser, communications co-ordinator for the Heart and Stroke Foundation, whose position is that there is insufficient evidence regarding chelation.

Heart disease is the leading cause of death in Canada. According to the latest Statistics Canada information, 72,338 people died from cardiovascular disease in 2004.

TACT is a double-blind, placebo-controlled study. This means neither those who administer the infusions nor the patients know who receives EDTA and who receives the placebo.

Non-smokers over 50 who have suffered a heart attack more than six weeks earlier are eligible for TACT. The trial is looking for 2,372 patients.

The study is free for the patient and takes five years to complete. After an initial assessment, patients will receive an infusion once a week for 30 weeks. This is followed by a maintenance program of one infusion every two to four weeks for eight treatments. Patients are then tracked for the remainder of the five years.

A chelation infusion often takes more than three hours, but patients can read or watch television while the needle is in their arm.

As part of the study, TACT is also assessing the efficacy of antioxidant vitamins and mineral supplements on heart disease, and patients may be given these too.

Bergman said possible side effects of chelation include low blood sugar, reduced calcium and vitamin B, as well as local skin irritation at the site of the infusion, kidney and liver damage and an allergic reaction to EDTA. Patients are monitored closely, he said, and in most cases, side effects are a result of chelation being performed incorrectly – too slowly or with an incorrectly calculated amount of EDTA.

Tom dalBarco has been going to Bergman's clinic since 1999. After two angioplasty surgeries, he was waiting for triple bypass surgery when his uncle told him about chelation.

"There was no way I wanted to have bypasses when I was in my 40s," he said.

DalBarco said that within three months of starting chelation, he felt better. He has since had two additional angioplasty surgeries, but has so far avoided bypass.

In total, the surgeries put in four stents – wire mesh tubes used to hold the arteries open. Only one is working.

"I have these three stents that are plugged, and the chelation basically opened up a minor passageway through them so that I could function," dalBarco said.

In the beginning, dalBarco parked directly across from Bergman's clinic, had trouble walking across the street and paid $20 for parking each time.

"Then I started parking two to three blocks away from the office and walking there, and parking for free."

While Bergman said he has a number of client success stories, a lot more work needs to be done before chelation could become mainstream.

Stone agrees. "If the results of the TACT trial are significantly positive in favour of chelation, the cardiology community will dismiss that because they've been dismissing it for decades, and one trial does not change practice," Stone said.

He emphasized that while responsible chelationists don't do this, cardiologists take issue with those who offer chelation as a replacement for surgery rather than an adjunct treatment.

"Where cardiologists have a difficulty is when people advise patients that they don't need bypass or they don't need angioplasty when they are in desperately life-threatening circumstances," Stone said.

For more information about the TACT study or to inquire about eligibility, please contact Bergman's clinic at 416-652-9862 or e-mail chelox@rogers.com.

Kids' sleep problems 'not a phase': psychologist

By JENNIFER M. MACLEOD
Special to the CJN

Maybe you've heard the saying, "If someone says they're sleeping like a baby, chances are, they've never had a baby."

Except in their first few days, when babies catch up on sleep after the ordeal of labour, it can take months or even years to synchronize them with the rest of the family's sleep schedule.

Helping kids achieve healthy sleep may be one of the most challenging tasks parents face in the early years, says Nicky Cohen, a clinical psychologist registered with the College of Psychologists of Ontario. She's dedicated her practice to coaching parents toward this goal.

Psychologist Nicky Cohen helps children achieve healthy sleep.

Before Cohen meets with parents, she ensures that medical issues have been ruled out. Snoring, pauses in breathing (sleep apnea), extreme night restlessness or a resumption of bedwetting – among other symptoms – could all be signs of a medical problem, according to neurologist Shelly Weiss at Toronto's Hospital for Sick Children.

If everything is physically normal, a behavioural approach like Cohen's can work well, Weiss says.

Initially, Cohen meets with parents for up to two hours. "It's hard for parents to concentrate and take notes if a child is with them," she says, so kids stay home if possible.

She tailors her approach to each family. More important than finding a one-size-fits-all sleep solution is discovering "what the parents are comfortable doing," Cohen says.

"There's no one way that all children should sleep," Weiss agrees. "It's based in culture and preference in families."

Cohen says she'd rather send parents home "with a plan that may take them a little longer that they can follow through with," than a quick fix that's impossible for their lifestyle. However, in any family, Cohen says, "consistency is probably the most important thing in successful treatment."

Alan (Woody) Berzen, a Thornhill pediatrician in practice for 26 years, says that "flip-flopping between different techniques is sort of the worst for any kid."

Fine-tuning a sleep plan to the family is essential. "There are people who can let kids cry [themselves to sleep] and people who can't… they're never going to do it [let kids cry themselves to sleep], no matter how much you persuade them," he says.

Berzen has begun referring patients to Cohen for help in creating customized sleep plans.

After meeting and discussing the child's current sleep routine, Cohen and the parents agree on a plan. She also provides readings to accompany the plan and information about creating a "sleep diary," to concretely track sleep patterns.

Parents will often follow up by phone for help in keeping on track or to modify the sleep plan if necessary.

Choosing a sleep strategy can be hard, she says, because parents have read so much conflicting information in books and on the Internet. One recent client, a physician with her first child, "has lots of knowledge…[but] she's really confused," Cohen says.

Sleep training doesn't have to be hard, she continues, but "on your own, it can be hard to get there." Many parents have tried sleep training without success, but "when we go over our plan together, they usually become much more consistent," Cohen adds. Most parents actually start seeing positive results within a week.

"The anticipation of doing sleep training is much worse than the actual carrying out of the plan," she says.

Sleep training should wait until the child is at least four months old. "Younger infants don't have the ability to self-soothe," she notes, an important concept in her practice.

Cohen generally waits until at least six months, an age when Weiss says, "In a healthy, well-grown baby, you can start looking at better sleep routines," often through gradually eliminating night feeds, which most older babies no longer need.

It can be helpful for parents to understand natural sleep patterns. "During the night, we cycle between dreaming and non-dreaming sleep," Weiss explains. Depending on his or her age, a child might experience six to nine brief wakeful periods of "micro-arousal." As adults, "we have the same thing… we don't remember in the morning that we were awake."

If infants or children develop the habit of fully awakening to nurse or for comfort, they may need parents' help achieving what Cohen calls "independent sleep onset," an essential skill for healthy, all-night sleep.

Staying up all day won't help, either, says Cohen. It's a myth that skipping daytime naps creates better night sleep. "The most common cause of [night] terrors is sleep deprivation."

It is a myth that kids will outgrow sleep problems. Four years ago, when Cohen's pediatrician assured her that her daughter's sleep problems would disappear on their own, she took a proactive approach instead, based on her belief that "many kids aren't born great sleepers – they just need some help," she says.

Not able to find many resources locally, she turned to U.S. experts, and eventually set up a Toronto practice that offers parents the same advice that helped her battle those sleepless nights.

"Don't delay in getting help," Cohen says. "I keep hearing from patients, 'I wish I had found you eight months ago.'"

"Sleep problems are probably one of the most persistent behavioural problems in children… it's not a phase; they don't grow out of it – unless you do something."

Q. I have been hearing a lot about vitamin D lately. Should we be taking it as a supplement?

A. Vitamin D is a hot topic these days, and with good reason. There is mounting research that seems to stack up in favour of the idea that vitamin D may have great benefits in preventing some cancers or slowing tumour growth. It used to be thought that vitamin D's biggest benefit was the prevention of rickets, which we have not seen in our area for many years. Vitamin D is added to all milk and milk products, the major source of the vitamin for many. The problem is most of us don't consume enough dairy products to get the recommended amount of vitamin D, about 1,000 IU (international units) a day.

The other main source of vitamin D is sunlight. Our bodies can produce the vitamin when we are exposed to the sun. However, in the northern part of North America – including all of Canada – we do not get adequate exposure during the winter, and most of us are now covered up with clothing or sunscreen in the summer, again limiting vitamin D availability. So a supplement seems like a wise choice.

Adults can take 1,000 IU of vitamin D per day. Vitamin D3 is the form that is best absorbed. Remember though, don't overdue it. Vitamin D is fat soluble, meaning it is stored in our bodies; so a mega-dose is not a good choice unless your doctor advises it. Also, be aware that most calcium supplements contain good amounts of vitamin D, and if you are already taking a calcium supplement with vitamin D, you may not need as much. It is also important to review the content of your multivitamin before adding a supplement.

Q. I am a young mother with young kids and limited cooking skills. I really want to be a better cook but have little time. Do you have some suggestions of where I can find some inspiring recipes? I feel as if I am always making the same few things over and over again?

A. This is a common question that I hear regularly. Good for you for aspiring to cook for your family. I have a few suggestions that I find work for many people and worked for me as well.

I prefer to read cooking magazines rather than cookbooks. Don't get me wrong – there are many great cookbooks, and I have a vast collection, but we tend to use the same few over and over. The reason I like magazines is first, because they are less expensive than a cookbook, and second, because they are seasonal, so that when you buy one in the summer, it is full of summery recipes using seasonal ingredients. Finally, magazines are full of pictures that help to inspire you as a beginner cook, as well as show you what the finished product could look like.

I also think that TV cooking shows are an invaluable resource. For inexperienced cooks, they show techniques as well as giving recipes. Furthermore, you are learning from many of the world's best chefs without investing in expensive cooking classes and you can watch them at your convenience. I have learned a ton from these shows and continue to be inspired by them.

My last recommendation is to use your friends and family as resources.

SENIOR STAR: The Constantia and Gibson retirement residences recently held a Senior Star event, a musical talent competition, attended by more than 150 people at the Bernard Betel Centre for Creative Living. Eight contestants took part, and Shirley Goodman was the first-place winner for the Thornhill-North York region. The talent competition was held across Canada to celebrate Chartwell residences and senior centres' National Appreciation of Seniors Day. A panel of judges will choose 10 finalists from among the local winners, and there will be a final competition in fall 2007. Contestants were, back row from left, Edith Glassman, Jack Rosen, Harvey White, Lydia Sullivan, Shirley Goodman, Wolfie Frysh, Vital Benrubi and Alf Gerson; judges, front row from left, were Constantia resident and radio entertainer Geri Migicovsky, CFRB radio personality Mark Elliot and Gibson resident and educator Eldon Comfort.

Metulla to host inaugural World Jewish Cup

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

There are no Mike Cammalleris on this list, not even an Adam or a Michael Henrich. AHLers Cory Pecker and Eric Himelfarb were unavailable, so Alex Voihanski, the general manager tasked with assembling a Canadian Jewish hockey team, looked elsewhere – to the East Coast Hockey League (ECHL), the NCAA, Canadian colleges and junior A.

Outside of former Quebec Rampart Benji Rubin, who became famous for making a major junior team even though he would not play on Shabbat, there aren't really any high-profile skaters on the team. That's not to say the team won't be good – there are enough professionals and otherwise highly skilled players to make Canada the team to beat at the inaugural World Jewish Cup, Voihanski said.

Canada will take to the ice at Metulla's Canada Centre on July 15 to open the tournament against Israel, followed by contests against the United States and France. The gold medal will be decided in a playoff round.

The tournament, chaired by Canada's Sid Greenberg, is being staged on Israel's northern border with Lebanon almost one year to the day after the war with Hezbollah.

It's meant to show solidarity with the people of Israel, introduce Jewish players from around the world to the State of Israel and demonstrate to the International Ice Hockey Federation (IIHF), which cancelled an international junior tournament in Metulla for security concerns, that Israel is capable of hosting a world-class event in the northern town.

Canada was to have competed against teams from the United States, France, Israel, Mexico and the Baltic (mostly Swedes and Russians), but Mexico and the Baltic team have pulled out.

Nevertheless, Alan Maislin, chairman of the Ice Hockey Federation of Israel and the main architect of the event, said the teams that will participate should provide spectators with good hockey.

The host Israelis, who will be coached by former Montreal bench boss Jean Perron, will be led by the three Eizenman brothers – Alon, Erez and Oren – who now live in Toronto.

Seth Klerer

France will feature several national team players and will be coached by Canadian Dave Henderson. The United States will be coached by John Anderson, the former Toronto Maple Leaf and now the man behind the bench of the AHL's Chicago Wolves.

Team Canada will be coached by Sherry Bassin, the head coach of 1983 and 1984 Canadian World Junior gold medal teams. Bassin also coached the Sault Saint Marie Greyhounds to three consecutive OHL championships before serving as assistant general manager of the Quebec Nordiques. He currently owns and manages the Erie Otters of the Ontario Hockey League.

While Canada's reputation for hockey excellence will no doubt precede it, Voihanski believes the United States will give Canada all it can handle on the ice. The Americans have chosen to go with college players, a reasonable approach given that it is a wide talent pool to choose from, he said.

Nevertheless, Canada's talent pool is the deepest, he continued. In addition to Rubin, Canada will rely on Jason Bailey, an Ottawa native who was a third round draft pick of the Anaheim Ducks and who has played for the University of Michigan and the Ottawa 67s. Defenceman Sean Starke, a Montrealer, played last year with the Quad City Mallards of the United Hockey League after skating for Bowdoin College in the NCAA.

Defenceman Oriel McHugh, another Montrealer, player last year for the ECHL's Roanoke Valley Vipers after a college career at the University of Vermont.

Vancouver native Trevor Smith was the leading scorer for the University of New Hampshire and has signed a pro contract with the New York Islanders, while Stacey Britstone, a former player with the Plymouth Whalers, played last year with the Tillsonburg Vipers in the OHA Senior League. Seth Klerer, former captain of the North York Rangers, played the past two years with RPI Engineers as a teammate of Oren Eizenman.

In all, Canada will rely on six full time professionals, five or six NCAA or CIAU players, and others from major junior and tier II junior A leagues, Voihanski said.

While this year's tournament was cut from six to four teams, Maislin believes future competitions will be bigger. When news began circulating in Europe about the tournament, players started coming out of the woodwork.

Jewish guys from Slovakia, the Czech Republic, Hungary, Sweden "who never identified with Judaism now have come back to their Jewish identity," he said. "The next time we do it, I believe we can have as many as nine countries. It's caught on."

While there are only four teams participating, as many as 1,000 fans might be coming to Israel to take in the competition, including family and friends, Maislin said.

Oren Eizenman

But it looks like Maislin won't be one of them. He spoke to The CJN from his hospital bed in Montreal one day before undergoing a heart procedure. He said it's unlikely his doctors will permit him to make the trip to Metulla.

Private schooling as public policy

By YONI GOLDSTEIN

New Views

There is a fairly significant secret about schooling that students generally keep to themselves: you learn virtually nothing of value in the first 12 years of going to school. Oh sure, the days are filled with teachers blubbering on about math this and science that, but ask most students what they learned in elementary and high school and they'll probably tell you, "Not much."

I'm too young to have forgotten how little I actually learned between Grades one and 12. Which means – and this is no coincidence – that I'm not old enough to have convinced myself that all the stuff taught in schools, plus the tests and grades, are of any significant value for kids.

After high school – now that's when we really start to learn. And there's a simple reason for that: in elementary and high school, we are students, there to be taught. But in university, trade school or the workforce, we are learners. We're there – at least most us are, anyway – because we finally have the opportunity to study the things we really want to know about. The vast majority of us had no clue what we wanted to do with our lives at age 18 because we were bogged down by 12 years of algebra classes, grammar lessons and memorizing the names and powers of all the Greek gods. There was little time for any self-examination or intellectual growth.

As educationally worthless as those elementary and high school years are, though, they serve a far more essential service to us. They act as an incubator of good social health. Schools teach us how to make friends, about the importance of teamwork and, in general, how to get along with our peers. Ask a doctor if studying the periodic table and memorizing the anatomy of a tadpole in Grade 10 biology class really benefited them in medical school and they'll surely say no. The note-sharing and pre-exam group cram sessions with classmates taught them a far more valuable lesson in the essential social aspects of life.

The cultivating of a social group, in the end, is more important in life than any chapter in any textbook.

So the argument for equal funding for religious school systems should not centre on the education prescribed for kids – kids will be forced to sit through equally useless lessons regardless of the classroom they're in. But culture is something you can't teach. You can only design a system within which it can be absorbed and then hope that it sticks to young people. And history shows us that those who are steeped in a culture from a young age are more likely to appreciate and contribute to that culture as they get older.

The preservation of culture is the compelling argument for why private, religious school systems must be supported by society as a whole. In Ontario, the value of religious schooling has, in essence, already been acknowledged by the provincial government's longstanding funding of Catholic school boards. Which makes that Liberal government's refusal to equally fund Jewish and Muslim schools all the more infuriating. You either fund all religious schools, or you fund none of them. Simple.

One more thought: There are those who argue that religious schools harm the greater social fabric by instilling in young people notions of exclusivity and insularity. There is something to be said for that: students in the Jewish day school system will exit Grade 12 with little or no understanding of the vast array of non-Jewish cultures out there.

But consider this: a healthy multicultural society must be built, first and foremost, on the foundation of individually healthy and strong cultures. In that sense, religious schools provide an important service not just to any specific religious group, but to the larger gathering of all groups.

GRILLED CHICKEN SALAD W/ MANGOES & GREENS

2 whole skinless boneless chicken breasts, halved
5 tblsps olive oil
2 scallions, minced
2 tsp fresh thyme leaves
1 tblsp balsamic vinegar
1 onion, minced
4 cups shredded romaine, rinsed & dried
1 small bunch watercress, stems discarded, leaves rinsed & dried
1/2 cup finely shredded red cabbage
1 large mango, peeled, pitted, and cut into 1" dice

On large plate drizzle chicken with 1 tblsp oil, sprinkle with scallions, 1 tsp thyme, salt & pepper to taste; turn to coat well. Marinate at room temperature, turning once, 30 min. In small bowl whisk together vinegar, onion, remaining thyme, salt & pepper to taste; add remaining oil, whisking vinaigrette until thick. Grill chicken on greased rack 4-5 min.on each side, or until cooked through. In large bowl, toss romaine, watercress, cabbage, mango with just enough of the vinaigrette to coat salad well. Transfer salad to a platter, top with the chicken. Serve the remaining vinaigrette separately.

By BILL GLADSTONE

Toronto-born Lawrence (Lol) Solmon (1863-1931) wore many hats, including that of managing director of the Royal Alexandra Theatre on King Street, which he was hired to build; it opened in August 1907, almost exactly a century ago. Historian Hye Bossin called him the "person of Jewish birth with the most important place in Toronto's stage history" and added that he was "without doubt the most popular and best known personality in the city" in his day. He built the Toronto Maple Leaf Baseball Stadium and was head of the Toronto Baseball and Athletic Club, a partner in the Sunnyside Amusement Company, a developer of Hanlan's Point and manager of the Mutual Street Arena. His father was one of the founders of the Holy Blossom Temple.

There is room for us both

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

URBAN WRITER

We really don't know what non-Jews think about us. Yet, I would hazard to guess that if we asked 100 of our people their opinion on such a matter, the overwhelming response would likely be that they consider Christian churches and their leaders to be, as a whole, anti-Jewish.

Certainly there is enough evidence to support this belief, however, we must keep in mind there are Christians who do indeed harbour positive feelings about the Jewish people. The following are some snippets from a speech given by the very prolific minister, Victor Shepherd, the pastor of Streetsville United Church, in October 2001, when he spoke about a moment he shared with an older Jewish man.

His words were sincere and his feelings for the Children of Israel were upbeat. I bring it to you because it's important to know who our friends are, especially at a time when our enemies are as ugly and perilous as the sludge at the bottom of our lakes.

"…And then there are the men and women I meet in ways that leave me amazed. It happened to me with most poignant profundity when I went to a funeral at Temple Sinai. Because I had arrived 45 minutes early, I went to a Jewish restaurant, Marky's Delicatessen, for a cup of tea. I noticed there were no seats available, and I was the only man without a hat on. All the other men were wearing either a yarmulke or a fedora. I waited for a minute, not knowing quite what to do, when at the back of the restaurant an old, thin Jewish man with the warmest smile and the face of an angel moved over on his seat and beckoned to me as he called out, 'There is room for us both!'

"My heart melted. I had grasped the double meaning he had uttered deliberately when he had said, 'There is room for us both.' I sat down beside him and we began to talk. He told me his older sister brought him to Canada prior to World War II. He and his sister were the sole survivors of his family. I asked him what he had done for a living. 'I was a simple peddler. I went door-to-door peddling tablecloths, sheets and pillow cases.'

"He said he was born in southeast Poland, in a small 'insignificant' village with a famous rabbi. 'It's a tradition,' he continued, 'that a rabbi remains in the place where he begins his work. Now, a minister has to go wherever he is sent. But our rabbi stayed in our little village, even though he could have gone anywhere at all, because the tradition meant more to him than the money; and besides, he loved us so much.'

"I then told him I was a minister. 'Oh, I knew that already,' he said as if it need not have been mentioned. It was spirit resonating with spirit.

"In view of the fact that words like 'minister' and 'Christian' are synonymous with persecution going back for centuries in Poland, do you have any grasp of what grace floods that old man's heart for him to have said to me, 'There is room for us both'? He knew I represented that institution which has afflicted his people for centuries.

"I'll not see that dear man until the day when Messiah tarries no more. But for my meeting with him I shall thank God for the rest of my life. Today my heart overflows in gratitude to God for the people whom he has brought before me, people from the big city as well as the tiny village in southeast Poland, not to mention soul mates because of whom I shall never be forsaken.

"Knowing the One whose depths are unfathomable and whose gift of himself is inexpressible, I am rendered ever more grateful for people whose richness is inestimable and for a universe whose wonders are endless." (www.victorshepherd.on.ca)

It's important to know who our friends are.

Federal Court denies 'Jerusalem, Israel' designation

By ANDY LEVY-AJZENKOPF
Staff Reporter

The Federal Court of Appeal has upheld a ruling that a Toronto teen's passport can't designate "Jerusalem, Israel" as his birthplace.

Eliyahu Yoshua Veffer, 19, who was born in Jerusalem but moved to Canada with his family in 1998, has fought the federal government since 2004 to have his passport reflect his belief that the city belongs to Israel.

Ottawa holds that Jerusalem's final status will be determined in peace negotiations.

It's the second time the courts have ruled against Veffer: the Federal Court handed down a similar decision last year.

At his May 8 hearing in Winnipeg, Veffer, the son of a Toronto rabbi, repeated his argument that the government's policy violates his Charter rights.

"My religion teaches me that Jerusalem is the capital of Israel. This is an integral part of my religious belief and my personal identity," Veffer wrote in a February 2005 affidavit. "When I am not allowed to have Israel in my passport… I feel that the government of Canada is refusing to allow me to express my identity as a member of the Jewish people."

But the appellate court ruled June 25 that Veffer's Charter rights aren't being violated and that any impact on his religious freedom is "negligible."

It ruled that a passport is not a document intended to express religious identity, but to identify a Canadian citizen and facilitate his or her travels.

"There is no evidence that the absence of a country name beside 'Jerusalem' hinders [Veffer's] ability to travel in any way," the ruling said.

"Mr. Veffer still maintains the freedom to express his faith and his subjectively held views as to the status of Jerusalem, he is just not able to do so in his Canadian passport."

The court added that even though Israel has occupied Jerusalem in its entirety since 1967, "[f]or the purposes of this appeal it is sufficient to say that the United Nations takes the position… since the adoption of Resolution 181 in 1947, that Jerusalem… has no sovereign."

The court said Veffer has the option to obtain an Israeli passport that would show "Jerusalem, Israel" as his birthplace.

Worrisome trend to delegitimize Israel growing in U.S. — see page 30

The News in Brief

CANADA

Ex-councillor Arrested

MONTREAL — A former Outremont, Que., city councillor with a history of conflict with the local chassidic community has been charged with armed assault after allegedly driving her car toward a chassidic man. Celine Forget will appear in court July 19. She was arrested July 4 at her home after Israel Brewer complained to police. Forget, a gardener, was working on a property neighbouring Brewer's home the evening of July 4. She and Brewer, who have a history of disagreements, became involved in an argument. She then allegedly got in her car and charged toward Brewer. He jumped out of the way and was not hurt. Over the past 15 years, Forget made many complaints against the chassidic community over alleged violations of zoning and other bylaws.

Man Fined For Hate

OTTAWA — An Ottawa man has been fined $4,000 and ordered to stop using the Internet to spread hate. The Canadian Human Rights Tribunal issued the ruling last week against Bobby James Wilkinson, 23, who posted hateful messages against blacks, Jews, Asians, gays, Arabs and Latinos on a "Canadian Nazi Party" website that he created and administered. It also contained posts urging people to kill blacks, Jews and gays, the tribunal heard. Ottawa lawyer Richard Warman filed the complaint against Wilkinson in 2003. Wilkinson did not attend the hearing against him earlier this year. The U.S. firm that hosted the site shut it down in 2004 for violating its hate provisions.

Israeli Diplomatic Cars in U.S. To Go Green

WASHINGTON — Senior Israeli diplomats in the United States will switch to hybrid gas-electric cars to cut down on petroleum consumption.

Sallai Meridor

The move, to be made this fall, was announced July 9 by Sallai Meridor, Israel's ambassador to the United States. The change will affect vehicles from the Washington embassy, Israel's nine U.S. consulates and Israel's mission to the United Nations.

"Reducing oil dependence and protecting the environment are key factors in improving international security," Meridor said. He said he's proud Israel is among the first countries to reduce oil dependency throughout its entire fleet.

In the years ahead, Israel plans to advance energy co-operation with the United States by collaborating in the development of alternative-energy technologies.

WORLD

Thieves Flood Shul

NEW ORLEANS — Copper thieves flooded a 103-year-old New Orleans shul that became unusable after Hurricane Katrina. Thieves sliced several pipes in Congregation Beth Israel's building last week, president Jackie Gothard said. A prospective buyer discovered the mess July 5. Cleanup began July 8. Gothard doesn't believe anti-Semitism is to blame. She said the sanctuary was under four feet of water and cleanup costs are unknown. It's unclear when the thieves entered the building, because the area is desolate. Most shul members lost their homes in the neighbourhood a half mile from the levees. They are praying together at an area Reform temple in a hall with a mechitzah.

Ramah Hosts Israelis

NEW YORK — Camp Ramah is welcoming bereaved Israeli children for the second year in a row. More than 90 Israeli children who have lost parents or siblings in wars or terror attacks will spend 10 days in the Conservative movement's camps in late July and early August. Forty-three will be hosted at Ramah's California branch. It's the second year this camp has taken part in the initiative, sponsored by Friends of the Israel Defence Forces. The group has been sending Israeli kids touched by war to camps in the United States since 2003. This year there were so many applicants that an additional group of 50 youngsters and counsellors will go to Camp Ramah in Massachusetts.

Iranian Defector Talks

TEL AVIV — An ex-Iranian deputy defence minister defected to the United States and told the CIA that Tehran has been pursuing a secret nuclear program, Yediot Achronot reported. Ali Reza Asgari, who went missing while visiting Turkey last month, said the Iranian program is enriching uranium with laser and chemical enhancers, said the report, which quoted an unnamed U.S. official.

Shul Vandalized

NASHUA, N.H. — A synagogue was vandalized in Nashua, N.H. Five windows at Temple Beth Abraham were smashed overnight July 9, building manager Richard Bryant told Foster's Online of Dover, N.H. Bryant said he found rocks inside the synagogue that had been part of a decorative display outside. He estimated the damage at $3,000.

Rabbi Attacked

KIEV — Ukrainian youths attacked a rabbi and tried to break into a Jewish school. Rabbi Shlomo Wilhelm was attacked in the yard of his shul on July 9 in the city of Zhitomir, in central Ukraine. Shul guards and local community members held off the unidentified attackers. The same day, a group of youths tried to break into a dormitory for girls at a local Jewish school, hurling verbal insults at the students. Police are investigating. Rabbi Wilhelm said the attacks weren't the first acts of anti-Jewish violence in town. Two years ago, the rabbi was verbally assaulted and beaten on one of the city's main streets.

Film In Production

WARSAW — The first co-produced Israeli-Polish movie started filming last week in Warsaw. Spring 1941, starring Joseph Fiennes, tells of a cellist's return to Poland 30 years after World War II and her memories of the Nazi occupation. The movie is based on stories by Ida Fink, a Shoah survivor who moved to Israel from Poland in 1957. Israel's Uri Barbash is directing the $2.5 million (US) film, which is being produced by Poland's Opus Film and Traxis Films of Israel.

'Toronto has lost a mensch'

Businessman, theatre impresario dies just shy of 93rd birthday

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

It was a sad day in Toronto on July 11 when Edwin "Honest Ed" Mirvish passed away at St. Michael's Hospital about two weeks shy of his 93rd birthday, and people all over the country are celebrating the life of a Canadian icon who touched the lives of so many.

Mirvish – remembered as a savvy businessman, a class act and for his sharp, dry wit – was most famous for his 160,000-square foot discount emporium called Honest Ed's, located at the corner of Bathurst and Bloor streets. But he's also credited with revitalizing the entertainment industry in Toronto by purchasing and renovating the Royal Alexandra Theatre in 1963, and building the Princess of Wales Theatre with his son, David, in 1993.

"For decades, Ed devoted his life to helping Torontonians and to making Toronto the great city it is. Whether it was his iconic landmark retail store that was responsible for breathing new life into the Bloor and Bathurst neighbourhood or his commitment to the performing arts, Ed's passion for his city was second to none," Toronto Mayor David Miller said in a statement.

'Honest Ed' Mirvish

The funeral for Mirvish, who is survived by his wife, Anne, his son David and his sister Lorraine, was held at Beth Tzedec Congregation last Friday. The service was led by Rabbi Yael Splansky of the Holy Blossom Temple, where Mirvish was a member for many years.

When the Mirvish family released a statement announcing his passing, messages of condolences from all over the country – from Jews and non-Jews alike, from family, friends, strangers and admirers – poured into Benjamin's Park Memorial Chapel's online memorial book.

"Ed Mirvish is one of the reasons why Toronto is the internationally renowned city it is. My grandmother, Esther Frydman, worked at Honest Ed's for over 25 years until her passing in 1980, and working there was something my grandmother took pride in, and I remember as a seven-year-old, taking pride in that fact, too," Jason Warga wrote.

"Toronto has lost a mensch. Toronto has lost an icon. Toronto has lost one of the greatest philanthropists of modern times. Toronto is very sad today, indeed. Toronto has lost a man for all seasons. Toronto has lost a wonderful, Jewish man who gave so much to so many ethnicities, religions and races – not asking for anything in return," Vardit Zafri wrote.

Mirvish's progression into becoming one of Canada's greatest success stories did not come out of luck or privilege, but hard work and determination.

Born to Jewish immigrants in Colonial Beach, Va., in 1914, Mirvish was given the name Yehuda, but his parents were persuaded by his cousin to Americanize his name and called him Edwin.

Nine years later, the Mirvish family moved to Toronto after their grocery store in Washington, D.C., went bankrupt.

After failing to sell sets of the Encyclopedia of Freemasonry to lodges in the Toronto area, his father, David, tried his luck again at opening a grocery store, this time on Dundas Street in the Jewish community. The Mirvish family lived humbly, in a small apartment behind the store. They rented the top floor to a rabbi who taught Hebrew to 50 students, with whom he had to share one bathroom.

During an interview almost 20 years ago, Mirvish told The CJN that when he bought his first mansion in Toronto, it was the bathrooms that sold him on it.

Bold steps by this Merchant

From the editor's desk

For most of us, especially for most Jews, sitting through a performance of The Merchant of Venice is very difficult.

We wince with terrible inner pain at the total humiliation and degradation of the Jew, Shylock. Our fists clench, emotions roil and our anger seethes when vile depredations and insults pour down upon him and his "race" like stinging, hot acid burning disfigurement into dignity.

The play takes place in 15th-century Venice, one of the commercial centres of Europe at the time. It tells two stories: the wooing and marriage of Bassanio and Portia; and the resolution of the debt owed by Antonio, the merchant in the title of the play, to Shylock, the Jewish moneylender.

Of course, the gravitas and centuries-old renown of the play surround the character of Shylock the individual and Shylock the embodiment of his people.

The attitudes and opinions expressed in the play toward and about Jews are deeply offensive. They are a social and cultural snapshot of the times in which Shakespeare wrote the play, which most scholars peg to have been between 1595 and 1600. He wrote them not to shock his audiences because they would not have been shocked at hearing those attitudes expressed.

But the anti-Jewish dialogue that Shakespeare wrote was more than the equivalent of today's beerhall boorishness intended as atmosphere and background to the main story.

It was, rather, a theological dialectic brilliantly conceived and executed in which, for the benefit of the masses standing at the foot of the stage and the aristocracy sitting in the balconies, the God of Mercy again prevails over the God of Justice. The way of Jesus supersedes the way of Moses. Ecclesia trumps synagoga.

Over the years, scholars and laypersons alike have pointed to Shylock's poignant speech in Act III in response to Salanio's and Salarino's taunts – "Hath not a Jew eyes?" – as proof of the fact that Shakespeare himself harboured none of the anti-Jewish sentiments that he places in the mouths of his actors. Many have also pointed to this famous speech as Shakespeare's attempt to humanize the Jew who more than once is referred to as the devil.

But one need not seek a benign motivation for the placement of that speech. None exists. Rather than humanize Shylock (the Jews), the speech achieves a diametrically opposite result and deliberately so.

It humanizes the Christians.

Shakespeare reiterates what had been taught and bred for centuries as church doctrine and absorbed and repeated as popular folk lore. The Jews were not hated because of any intrinsic qualities, which, after all, Shakespeare writes are shared by all human beings. "If you prick us, do we not bleed?"

No. The Jews were hated, Shakespeare confirms, because of their vile behaviour. And what behaviour could be viler than to demand and actually try to slice a pound of flesh from near a man's heart?

Graham Greene as Shylock

The culminating, climactic scene in the courtroom – when Shylock plunges his knife forward to collect his debt – in the version currently running at the Stratford Festival of Canada brings home this fundamental aspect of the play with powerful, gripping clarity.

It is also indicative of the bold, innovative directing of the play by Richard Rose. Antonio bravely bares his chest for the excision by Shylock. But rather than having him sitting and held in a chair, Rose has Antonio, lying on the floor, each arm tethered to a rope, stretched and pulled to the side. The scene is harrowing. Antonio's prostrate, pitiful body forms a crucifix. And the Jew, Shylock, hovers sinisterly above him, ready to kill the Christian, as before him, the Gospels assert, the first Christian was killed by vile Jews.

From the opening scene to the last, Rose brings newer and more pointed insights into the play. In the first scene, in reference to a casual comment by Salarino to a "two-headed Janus," Rose has his actors wearing a two-sided mask, a pig's head on one side and and an emotionless human face on the other. In the last scene, Jessica, left all alone on the stage, covers her head with a shawl and hauntingly chants the beseeching prayer Avinu Malkeinu.

Graham Greene as Shylock is masterful at conveying meaning and emotion through the use of expression, movement and the gestured glance. But his delivery of the lines seemed sometimes too hurried, too conversational in tone and insufficiently angled with the edge, bitterness and torment that have been the role's usual tenor.

Severn Thompson is a superb Portia, executing the role with flare and elegance. She and Raquel Duffy, Portia's confidante Nerissa, play their roles with authority and command the stage with impeccable timing.

Shakespeare's play is a triumph of the theatre. Seeing it performed, understanding its history and import over the years and yet marvelling at the staging and acting is a triumph, too, of sorts, of Jewish confidence and of the goodness of living in a land where fists clench in anger at attitudes played on a stage and not, in the main, at such attitudes played on the streets or in alleyway shadows.

Zareinu principal was advocate for special needs kids

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

Carol Goldman will be remembered warmly by students, parents and staff whose lives she touched as principal and clinical co-ordinator of Zareinu Educational Centre.

Obituary

The school – which grew under her leadership from 20 to 73 full-time students – serves children with special needs including including cerebral palsy, Down syndrome and autism spectrum disorder.

Goldman died July 11 at North York General Hospital at age 60, following a brief illness.

"She went to bat for everybody. She fought everybody's battles, but she couldn't fight this one," said her sister, Rochelle Eisen.

As an educator, advocate for government funding for children with disabilities, and author and co-author of six educational books, the Toronto native was "incredibly creative, passionate and people-centred. Everything that she did revolved around consultation and making sure that the family was involved every step of the way in their child's progress and development," said Randy Spiegel, the school's executive director. "She was totally committed to the betterment of others."

Goldman cared about every aspect of a child's education and wanted to ensure that all Zareinu students received as much Jewish and secular education as possible for their level of ability, said Ezriel Reichman, a Zareinu board member who was involved in Goldman's hiring.

"Her qualifications were not only impeccable, they were incredible," he said.

She married Mel Goldman in 1967 and gravitated to ECE after their two children were born.

Marion Goldmintz, their child's preschool teacher, was a mentor who became Goldman's close friend and later her co-principal at Zareinu.

Goldman, who had previously worked in a dental office, showed a "natural knack, a way of relating to children, that was very special," Goldmintz recalled.

Carol Goldman

The two women worked together out of Cresthaven Public School, with Goldman serving as classroom assistant and Goldmintz as the licensed teacher. At the same time, Goldman took night classes to obtain her own teaching credentials.

They opened Cresthaven, one of the first preschools to integrate children with special needs, and supervised the school for 17 years before moving to Zareinu as co-principals 14 years ago. While at Cresthaven, they also consulted to other schools and designed programs and workshops for educators.

As well, Goldman taught student teachers at the School of Child and Family Studies of the Canadian Mothercraft Society, sat on the Metro Task Force for Child Abuse, and chaired the board of J & F Home Child Care Services.

Earlier this year, she was an honoree at a fundraiser put on by DANI (Developing and Nurturing Independence), an organization created by parents of young adults with special needs.

When Goldmintz retired after four years at Zareinu, Goldman left her other positions to devote herself to heading the school. Later, she lobbied for government funding for applied behavioural analysis (ABA) for children with autism, as well as for therapies and respite care to help children with disabilities and their families.

Goldman "was an amazing person" with a lot of friends and a large extended family, Goldmintz said.

"She was very warm… She was helpful, she was kind, sympathetic. She was always there for you, and she didn't take herself too seriously. She had a great sense of humour, and she was very supportive."

She didn't need any recognition or anyone "to tell her she was wonderful or good. She wanted it quiet," her sister said.

"That was her whole life, Zareinu and her family … there was no bad [to be said about her], there was only good."

Goldman leaves her husband Mel, children Jordan and Elisa, her sister Rochelle Eisen and brother Phillip Campol, and two grandchildren.

New Mount Sinai logo links past and future

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Toronto's Mount Sinai Hospital has a new logo: a white Star of David with blue wings between the points of the star.

But look more closely and you'll see that the logo actually has the star superimposed on other sideways stars in different shades of blue.

MOUNT SINAI HOSPITAL
The Best Medicine.

The blue wings can be arranged in different configurations for the hospital's various departments or for other uses the logo will have, said Judith John, the hospital's senior vice-president of communications and marketing.

The logo is accompanied by a new tagline, "Bright Minds. Big Hearts. The Best Medicine."

The logo, and tagline where appropriate, will be on signage, business cards, letterhead, lanyards, ID cards, brochures and PR materials, not to mention souvenirs such as mugs, T-shirts and caps. There are even cookies with the new logo.

John said the former logo, a stylized view of the hospital, "didn't feel expressive of Mount Sinai now and in the future."

She said the new logo is modern and dynamic, and illustrates both Mount Sinai's commitment to the hospital's Jewish heritage, as well as its openness to the entire community

In coming up with the new branding, the hospital "looked hard" at the competitive environment for fundraising – especially other hospitals and universities – in terms of services, facilities and academic appeal, John said.

Hospital personnel, hospital administration, patients, and Mount Sinai Hospital Foundation members were all asked for their input, and they were delighted to participate, she added.

"They showed their pride of being part of the place."

Mount Sinai is conscious of the health care budget crunch and the competition for philanthropic dollars. Creating and establishing the new logo, John said, is "the cost of doing business in a competitive world."

Nevertheless, the hospital is not rushing into the change. It will be a gradual process, with the logo being replaced as current supplies and signage run out or wear out.

John feels that the new tagline, "Bright Minds. Big Hearts. The Best Medicine" captures the thoughts that people expressed about the hospital over the year that the new branding was being developed.

Those thoughts included terms such as "pride in our heritage," "warm," "compassionate," "smart," "professional" and "leadership."

It will dovetail with Renew Sinai, the hospital's capital redevelopment plan that extends to the year 2020. It will include significant upgrades to the women's and infants' health program, as well as to surgery, the emergency department, critical care projects, and inpatient and infrastructure projects.

Carol Solomons' granddaughters grew their hair long so they could donate it to A Child's Voice Foundation: Angel Hair For Kids.

Cousins raise $13,000, donate hair to foundation

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

To honour the memory of their grandmother, Carol Solomons, seven of her granddaughters recently donated their hair to A Child's Voice Foundation: Angel Hair For Kids.

Solomons died of cancer a year ago. Her granddaughters, aged seven to 11, grew their hair to give it to the foundation. The organization creates hairpieces for children who are from financially disadvantaged families and have lost their hair as a result of cancer treatments, alopecia and burns.

Along with their donation of hair, the children raised more than $13,000 for the foundation.

The seven first cousins are Carly Cohen, Madison and Michelle Dloomy, Brooke, Jordana and Stephanie Goldenberg, and Halle Solomons.

"We want to raise awareness that there are a lot of children who have lost their hair to illness who need to feel normal," says Lori Goldenberg, one of Solomons' daughters.

"If more people are aware, maybe there wouldn't be wig shortages," she adds.

For more information about A Child's Voice Foundation: Angel Hair For Children, call 905-275-3434, write to 3034 Palstan Rd., #301, Mississauga, Ont., L4Y 2Z6, or e-mail roslyn@childsvoicefoundation.com.

Carol Solomons' granddaughters hold their hair, which has just been cut for donation to A Child's Voice Foundation: Angel Hair For Kids.

The future we hold in our own hands

The Jewish People Policy Planning Institute (JPPPI), an independent think tank based in Jerusalem, has a straightforward yet profoundly important mission. It strives "to promote the thriving of the Jewish people via strategic thinking and planning on issues of primary concern to world Jewry."

The institute invited some 120 public officials, politicians, researchers, scholars and key decision-makers last week to Jerusalem for a three-day conference to deliberate and offer ideas On the Future of the Jewish People. Former Canadian justice minister Irwin Cotler delivered keynote remarks on the existential threats facing Israel and the Jewish people.

One of the most compelling topics on the agenda explored the increasing efforts among academics around the world to delegitimize the rightful place of a Jewish state in the otherwise Muslim Middle East. In particular, the conference was warned not to assume that the anti-Israel campaign is active only in Europe.

Avinoam Bar-Yosef, JPPPI's director general, termed the expanding anti-Israel campaign among American opinion makers on campus and elsewhere a "long-term threat" to Israel.

Brandeis University president Jehuda Reinharz echoed Bar-Yosef's sentiments. He told Ha'aretz that American academics are at the forefront of those denying Israel's right to exist as a Jewish state. "My feeling – and that of many people – is that we are at the start of a new era with regard to attitudes toward Israel in the U.S.," he added.

Though the threat has been identified, strategies for countering it have not. Reinharz is worried. "I see no combined effort to fight [the anti-Israel campaigns] by the Jewish organizations, and in truth, I myself don't know how this could be done," he said.

The situation as described on American campuses may not wholly apply to Canadian campuses. But we know there are similarities. And we have seen in the past on campuses here levels of hostility to Israel and to Jews in general that have been shocking in their vehemence and extreme contempt.

To deal with the "Jewish" crises looming on the horizon, including the many campaigns by zealous anti-Israel propagandists, the institute propounded a number of recommendations aimed at Israeli and Diaspora leaders. Indeed, the cornerstone of all the recommendations was the urgent need to recruit and train a new generation of leaders.

"The quality of leaders will be critical for the future of the Jewish people. This makes their development all the more essential."

But the development of leaders falls upon us all. It is a future we can and must build with our own hands, beginning with enhancing access to education for our children. Education is the portal to awareness, identity, caring, commitment, sacrifice and leadership.

Officials of six agencies providing relief to victims of the fighting in Lebanon, including CARE, the American Red Cross and Save the Children Federation, denied supporting an ad that ran in several U.S. newspapers criticizing Israel. The ad appeared, in the New York Times, Washington Post, Boston Globe and Chicago Tribune, among other publications.

Prosecute Nazi war criminals

I received a letter from the Prime Minister's Office, dated June 27, 2007, in reply to a letter I sent regarding the prosecution of Nazi war criminals living in Canada. The PMO stated, in part: "Thank you… for your comments concerning war criminals. We agree that Canada can never be a safe haven for anyone who has been involved in war crimes, crimes against humanity or genocide. Moreover, please be assured that Canada's new government will continue to strongly speak out against war crimes, human rights abuses and genocide around the world."

While I am thankful and appreciative of a reply from the Prime Minister's Office, I am very, very disappointed that the main reason and concern of my letter was completely ignored.

My letter said: "Prime Minister [Stephen Harper], you so rightly said, 'Remembering is not enough," as you urged the world to learn from history because the Holocaust 'stands alone in the annals of human evil.'"

I humbly and passionately urge you to put your own wise worlds into deeds, and without further inexcusable delay, prosecute the known World War II Nazi war criminals still living in Canada.

Spend government money on children

The article "Families sue for disabled funding in faith schools" (CJN, July 5) raises the question of why it takes a lawsuit filed by parents from our community to get the Liberal government's attention. The lawsuit seeks to get the provincial government to spend the full amounts of money that the government has set aside for the special needs children in religious schools each year. Your reporter should have asked why Michael Bryant, the attorney general, has refused to meet with the families of these disabled children. Bryant has decided instead to put forth his lawyers to fight these families in court. Why doesn't he spend the government's money on the disabled children in our Hebrew schools, instead of on lawyers?

Treating employees badly

Rabbi Elyse Goldstein's column "Keep your lawn kosher" (CJN, July 5) on how we as Jews have treated poor gardeners and landscapers resonated very strongly with me. I recently hired a nanny, and in the process interviewed many poor immigrant women who were treated badly by their former employers, who were Jews. One left her job because she was required to work seven days a week, with no days off.

As a Jew, I was ashamed to hear these stories. The Torah and our tradition, which specifically mention labour relations, demand better from us than this. These actions also give Jews as a whole a bad name. But most importantly, we are not so far ourselves from being poor immigrants. As the Torah demands that we "love the stranger, for you were strangers in the Land of Egypt," we should also be fair to immigrants to honour the memory of our own immigrant grandparents or great-grandparents who were at the mercy of their employers and who paved the way for us to be in such a comfortable place in society that we are in today, able to hire gardeners or nannies.

Community should have paid gardener

In her column "Keep your lawn kosher" (CJN, July 5), Rabbi Elyse Goldstein tells of a Jewish neighbour who cheated her non-Jewish gardener of his pay. Her conclusion was that Jews should be honest in their dealings. This, however, is not enough. The lesson of "The Good Samaritan" or of tikkun olam includes not only personal honesty, but fixing wrongs where you see them. At Yom Kippur, we pray for forgiveness for communal, not personal, sins.

It is not enough to complain that all Jews are not honest. This is obvious. Rabbi Goldstein left out the part that all Jews, like the Good Samaritan, should try to fix wrongs when they see them. She should have ensured that the gardener was paid by herself or the Jewish community. By such an action, Judaism would have earned the respect it deserves.

British intellectuals not historically anti-Semitic

By JAMES MORTON

A few weeks ago, as rockets continued to fall on Sderot, Israel, I was in Jerusalem reading the press reports on the increasing tide of anti-Israeli (read anti-Semitic) boycotts from the United Kingdom. I was struck by how curious it is that anti-Semitism has found a renewed life in Britain.

Theodor Herzl's great book The Jewish State suggests Great Britain as a safe harbour for the financing and planning of the reborn Israel, precisely because anti- Semitism, a problem in Europe, was not a significant issue in Britain. British academics and intellectuals were not, until very recently, anti-Semitic. Britain was a friendly home to its Jews. Unexpectedly, the new anti-Semitism, driven by radical ideologues, has recently found a home in some British intellectual circles.

James Morton

As is all too well known, Britain's National Association of Teachers of Further and Higher Education voted in May this year to boycott Israeli academics. This is the third time since 2002 that British academics have gone on record to censure and isolate Israeli academics.

In 2002, 123 British academics published an open letter in the London Guardian calling for a "moratorium" on all cultural and research links with Israel.

In 2004-2005, the British Association of University Teachers voted to boycott two Israeli universities for their alleged complicity in their government's military policies. Only after a tremendous struggle was the British Association of University Teachers vote overturned. One would reasonably conclude that anti-Semitism is intellectually respectable among British thinkers – and sadly, that conclusion may have some truth.

But historically, anti-Semitism is not linked to British intellectuals. The trend of British thinking under Queen Victoria, when British power and prestige were at their height, was certainly not anti-Semitic. Speaking on a bill to remove civil disabilities against Jews in 1830, Tomas Macaulay said, "We are free, we are civilized, to little purpose, if we grudge to any portion of the human race an equal measure of freedom and civilization." His comments reflected the progressive views of Victorian England, its leaders and intellectuals.

Religious bigotry was on a downward slope. Alfred Lord Tennyson spoke for his nation when he wrote: "There lives more faith in honest doubt, believe me, than in half the creeds."

In 1837, the queen knighted Moses Haim Montefiore. When he dined with the queen, special arrangements ensuring that his food and the dishes it was served on were strictly kosher raised no issue. Four years later, Isaac Lyon Goldsmid was made a baronet, the first Jew to receive a hereditary title. In July 1845, Jews were allowed to run for municipal office, and in 1855, Sir David Salmons was elected lord mayor of London. The queen, although she made no public statements on the subject, made it clear that she viewed Jews as an able and loyal people who had long been mistreated by Christian Europe.

The removal of limitations on Jews was not without controversy. The right of Jews to be members of Parliament was disputed – the House of Lords repeatedly blocked changes allowing Jews to sit as MPs from 1833 until 1858. But the trend in favour of increased Jewish rights was unmistakable. Newspapers held up the House of Lords' intransigence as proof of the backwardness of that House. Certainly the electorate did not appear to be anti-Semitic. Up to 1858, Jews had been elected to the Commons, often by wide margins, but had been barred from taking their seats.

In 1851, the elected member for Greenwich insisted on taking his seat and voting, though he had not been sworn (and could not be sworn unless he took the oath "on the true faith of a Christian"). A genuine constitutional crisis ensued: the Commons had passed legislation allowing Jews to sit as early as 1833, but all such legislation was vetoed by the House of Lords. One House was determining the constitution of the other.

Finally a compromise was reached allowing the Commons to admit Jews, and in 1858, Baron Lionel de Rothschild, substituting the phrase "so help me, Jehovah" for the Christian words, was allowed to sit as a member of Parliament. Two years later, a more general form of oath avoiding the requirement to swear to a specifically Christian deity was introduced.

Mose Haim Montefiore, on his 100th birthday. He was knighted in 1837.

Sir John Simon, the first Jew to act as a British judge, was elected to Parliament in November 1868, from Dewsbury in Yorkshire. He was re-elected in 1874, 1880, 1885 and 1886, and sat continuously for 20 years, retiring in November 1888, even though there was not a single Jewish voter in his constituency. Since 1858, every British Parliament has had at least a few Jewish members.

Anti-Semitism in Britain, by the latter part of the 19th century, was seen as vulgar and generally lower class. When Richard Francis Burton (1821-1890), who was otherwise a leading British intellectual and diplomat, expressed a most troubling outburst of anti-Semitism in a frightening, unpublished manuscript, Human Sacrifice among the Sepherdine [sic] or Eastern Jews (still in the possession of the Board of Deputies of British Jews in London), his outburst was seen as a sign of madness and not considered worthy of consideration for rational debate.

In the 1880s, Jews were appointed to the House of Lords, and by 1890, all restrictions for every government position were removed. Benjamin Disraeli, who was baptized as a child but was perceived throughout his life as being Jewish (and in fairness he shared that perception), was prime minister twice, in 1868 and 1874. In 1876, he was created Earl of Beaconsfield.

Victorian Britain also saw the rise of Christian Zionism – a non-Jewish movement to re-establish a Jewish State in the historical boundaries of Israel. In truth, Christian Zionists were often motivated by a world view that suggested a reborn Jewish State would be a place for mass conversion of Jews to Christianity.

Christian Zionists had a significant following in British intellectual circles, including such powerful spokespeople as writers George Eliot (Daniel Deronda), Laurance Oliphant and the less well-known Charlotte Elizabeth (Judea Capta). Important statesmen such as Lord Salisbury and Lord Shaftesbury, and military leaders such as Colonel Churchill, promoted the restoration of a Jewish commonwealth in what, since Roman times, had been known to western Christendom as the Holy Land or Palestine.

Indeed, the highly implausible concept that the people of Britain were, in fact, part of the lost tribes of Israel was widely believed. Rev. John Wilson's Our Israelitish Origins was originally published in the 1840s and was remarkably popular – in fact, the British-Israel World Federation still exists and enjoyed the patronage of prominent Britons including Princess Alice, Countess of Athlone (Alice Mary Victoria Augusta Pauline, née Princess Alice of Albany Feb. 25, 1883-Jan. 3, 1981), a granddaughter of Queen Victoria.

Jews were so well-established in Britain that the only modern anti-Jewish riots in British history, which took place in South Wales in 1911, were aimed at Jews by striking railway workers. precisely because Jews were part of the "ruling classes." The rioting was widely covered (with uniform disapproval) by newspapers. Winston Churchill, then home secretary, quickly put down the rioting with troops, and his actions were generally lauded by the press. By contrast, regular anti-Catholic rioting continued in Britain well into the 1930s without significant media comment, and troops were not called out to quell such incidents.

By the end of the 19th century, Baron Henry de Worms had been secretary of state under Lord Salisbury, and Sir Julian Goldsmid had been deputy speaker of the Commons. In 1906, the Jewish Encyclopedia could write: "It may be stated that anti-Semitism as such does not exist in England."

It was because of the well-established tolerance for Jews and their success in Britain that Herzl was confident in saying that the administration and financing for the return to Israel ought to be set up in England. Although there were issues regarding immigration of poor Jews from Russia, and the final days of British rule in Palestine were problematic, Jews felt, quite properly, very much at home in Britain until at least the 1970s.

When Jacob Bronowski, perhaps Britain's best known scientific intellectual in the post-War period, wrote, in 1974, as a Polish Jew who came of age in England, "I whom England made," it was a proud affirmation of being both Jewish and British, something that required neither compromise nor apology.

It may be that the recent rise of anti-Semitism in Britain is transitory and driven more by displaced anti-American feeling than anything else. Be that as it may, the boycott news is very troubling. That said, the concern must not be overstated. British Jews sit in the Commons, the Lords, on the Bench and at the highest levels of British professions. British history does not show a trend to anti-Semitism. Constant vigilance and strong, direct opposition to the boycotts, as well as being prepared to explain that Israel is a free and democratic country, will defeat the new anti-Semitism.

True graduation days

Rabbi Chaim Steinmetz in Montreal

My twin boys Akiva and Hillel graduated in June

Graduation is a rite of passage, a moment for these sixth graders to take stock of their educational achievements. But it's also a rite of passage for parents We marvel at how the toddlers we just dropped off at kindergarten are already at the cusp of maturity

So please indulge me as I write out of naches!

Rites of passage are important. In Judaism, a child who turns bat or bar mitzvah is considered responsible for his or her actions. By necessity, a birthday is the dividing line, arbitrarily declaring that the child is now an adult.

Graduations are also arbitrary dividing lines. But far more important than ceremonial graduation days are the unexpected moments that test the character of a young adult. These true graduation days always arrive unexpectedly

David, a young shepherd, visits his brothers in the army. There, Goliath is challenging any Israelite soldier to fight him one on one. As the soldiers cower, David offers to fight Goliath

David is ridiculed by his brothers, and even King Saul demurs at first, saying, "You are not able to go out against this Philistine and fight him. You are only a boy, and he has been a fighting man from his youth."

But David, already anointed to be a future king, insists. David's battle against Goliath marks his true graduation day

That's when a young person rises to the occasion. Being anointed with academic degrees means nothing until one has passed real-life tests.

Tony Benetatos graduated in just a few hours. A "probie" firefighter, the 21-year-old was assigned to a firehouse seven blocks from the World Trade Center. Two filmmakers were filming Benetatos for a documentary, hoping to see how the "boy turns into a man in nine months." They followed Benetatos in his first days on the job, as senior firefighters broke him in

Then 9/11 occurs. Firefighters fight on the front line, risking their lives to save the lives of others. Benetatos shows remarkable courage and compassion. On 9/11, Benetatos becomes a hero.

He passed his true graduation day with honours. As the producer says at the end of the documentary, "we wanted to watch a boy become a man over nine months. Turns out, the boy became a man in nine hours."

On the road to becoming an adult, every child must pass a true graduation day. There won't be any caps and gowns, there won't be celebratory parties, but on that day, like King David and Tony Benetatos, the boy will become a man.

My blessing to Akiva, Hillel and all the graduates is that when their true graduation day arrives, they will pass with flying colours.

Mazal tov!

If we build it, they will come

Gil Troy in Montreal

There is, alas, a vast disconnect between traditional Judaism and today's me-oriented, iPod generation. Our synagogues and our schools, our homes and our communities, seem far better at producing alienated, bored, disengaged Jews than proud, stimulated and committed Jews. This failure is particularly apparent among the twentysomething and thirtysomething set, who often make defining life choices at a stage of life when they seem most distant from Judaism and the Jewish community

As easy as it is to diagnose the problem, it's hard to find the solution Some seek to open as many portals as possible for young Jews to "do Jewish" together. Others fear watering down our ancient product too much. In early July in Jerusalem, 120 young Jewish innovators from 25 countries gathered to contemplate new ideas for the Jewish future. The conference, called ROI 120, for the "return on investment" that funders seek, is sponsored by the identity-oriented Lynn and Charles Schusterman Foundation and birthright israel

In one classic exchange in a town-hall meeting with all 120 participants that I moderated, a young rabbi proclaimed the importance of uniting his generation around core ideals. I pressed him, asking what that uniting vision could be. He said: "recognizing that whatever God you believe in, God is the source of justice in the world." A Jewish activist from New York replied that Judaism is a mosaic and we all must find the facet that speaks personally to us

Here was a great illustration of the modern dilemma that Judaism faces: do we try honing a uniting vision or do we encourage "Shivim panim laTorah" – 70 different faces or ways into Judaism? The "unitarians" risk alienating those who do not share the common assumptions or the desired goal, while those of the "mosaic persuasion" risk creating such a diverse and colourful mixture that Judaism will lose its meaning and its focus After all, a mosaic with no plan is a mess

In a smaller session, we addressed a different variation on this dilemma. One Jewish hipster said he considered getting five Jews to walk their dogs together to be a Jewish activity, and he resented the rabbis who were always asking whether such activities were "quality Jewish experiences."

In a modern update of "I think, therefore I am," he was saying, "If Jews do it, therefore it is Jewish." He also reflected the modern Internet assumption that whatever gets the most clicks wins. But Judaism has never been a popularity contest. We need deeper criteria than "if it feels good, do it." Jewish leaders would be guilty of false advertising if we misled young Jews into thinking that Judaism does not require spiritual and intellectual heavy-lifting

While the conference did not resolve these issues, I walked away impressed by these young activists' pride, creativity and passion. We all agreed with the rabbis that it is not for us to complete the task, but we dare not absolve ourselves of responsibility, either Gathering the young superstars together, engaging these questions, seeking solutions and developing a network for continuing the quest together seemed noble – and enough of an accomplishment, even with so many tasks undone and issues unresolved

After the conference, I attended one of the first Israel Baseball League games. The delicious mix of old and new, of Israel and America, was charming, as the Tel Aviv Lightning beat the Modi'in Miracle at the field in Kibbutz Gezer

Tel Gezer, an archeological site, looms behind centrefield. A cornfield abuts right field, evoking the movie Field of Dreams, in which Kevin Costner immortalized W.P. Kinsella's expression, "If you build it they will come."

Contemplating Tel Gezer's layers of history and baseball's ability to evoke future dreams rooted in warm nostalgia, I thought about the power of the Jewish past, the need for a contemporary renewal, and our worries and hopes for the future. I believe that if we build it, they will come. If we re-create a Judaism that is inviting but serious, relevant but rooted, and open to new approaches but respectful of tradition, we can succeed

We need a mosaic that offers many interesting ways into the Jewish conversation, but we can't sacrifice the value of having core ideals, unifying messages, solid beliefs and grand visions.

The Jerusalem Film Festival is beseder

Sara R. Horowitz in Toronto

"The most dangerous words in this country are 'yih'yeh beseder' – it will be OK," Lia van Leer said to me in front of the Jerusalem Cinematheque, three days before the opening of July's 24th Jerusalem Film Festival.

The Cinematheque, which houses the Israel Film Archives and hosts the annual Jerusalem Film Festival, had been closed for the past year for extensive renovation. The re-dedication was scheduled to precede the opening of the festival. With signs of ongoing construction around us, it was not at all clear to van Leer that the deadline for completion would be met, that things would indeed be beseder.

Cinematheque is the brainchild of van Leer, an 83-year-old dynamo who serves as its founder and director. Housed in a refurbished, centuries-old building with a magnificent view of the Old City walls, it contains tens of thousands of archival prints of films, along with a film research library, film classes and screening venues.

Decades earlier, van Leer recognized the value of film not only as entertainment, but as an art form, a mode of reflecting and reshaping contemporary culture. Long before other Israelis took movies seriously as anything more than a forgettable pastime, she and her late husband, Wim van Leer, began collecting and preserving Israeli and pre-state films.

Eventually, she expanded her mandate to include Jewish films more generally, seeking out rare copies of European Jewish films – remnants of the thriving Yiddish culture destroyed during the Holocaust. Her private collection was the beginning of what would become the Israel Film Archives based at Cinematheque, boasting the most extensive collection of Jewish films in the world, and the largest collection of films on the Holocaust.

A recipient of the illustrious Israel Prize for lifetime achievement, van Leer put the Jerusalem Film Festival on the map not only as a showcase for the finest in Israeli cinema, but also as a venue for bringing international films to Israel

This year's festival's opening ceremony, taking place during the 40th year of Jerusalem being in Israeli hands, served as a display of much that is well with the city and the country. Taking place in the open-air venue of the Sultan's Pool – a Herodian reservoir just outside the walls of the Old City – it visually cements the ancient with the new.

Anyone who has attended a performance at the Sultan's Pool knows that even in the heat of the Israeli summer, cool Jerusalem winds whip through the valley of Hinnom between the Old City and the neighbourhood of Yemin Moshe. It can be surprisingly chilly – even for those accustomed to Canadian climes – and veterans know to come equipped with sweaters, heavy socks and even hooded sweatshirts. This year, the festival distributed souvenir fleece blankets to the hundreds if people who attended the opening ceremonies and film.

As a medium, film projects in ways that enable us to see places we have never been, and to see familiar places in new ways. Because its lens offers us perspectives different from our own, it opens us to a range of views. Cinema's potential to encourage diversity was emphasized by the musical performance on opening night, featuring popular Israeli vocal artists accompanied by an Orthodox boys choir and a Jewish-Arab children's choir

Dieter Kosslick, director of the Berlin Film Festival – the world's largest – inaugurated the festival. It was Kosslick's first visit to Israel, and he said that he found it profoundly meaningful He noted that he was born in 1948 – that is to say, after the end of World War II – but nonetheless felt a particular sense of responsibility to history as a German. He recollected that he got to know Lia van Leer through their shared involvement in film culture. Through years of attending international film festivals, they formed a special friendship.

Over time, they developed a certain ritual During the Third Reich, books by Jewish authors and Jewish sacred texts were declared "degenerate," and they were confiscated and publicly burned. Van Leer collected volumes that had somehow eluded this destruction – saved remnants. Each time she and Kosslick met, she would select several volumes, old and crumbling, for him. He would, at his expense, have them restored and rebound.

As it turned out, Lia van Leer's worst fears evaporated. The renovated Cinematheque was ready on schedule, and the festival was, indeed, beseder, and more.

The Kirshner File

A cornucopia of books...

Book publishers never rest, as this batch of eclectic books gloriously proves.

Albert Einstein was not only a great scientist, the greatest since Issac Newton, but a political activist who committed his thoughts to paper. Einstein on Politics (Princeton University Press), edited by David E. Rowe and Robert Schulmann, offers readers a panoramic view of his writings on Zionism and anti-Semitism, nationalism, the fate of Jews during the Holocaust, war, peace, pacifism and nuclear proliferation. Einstein was a vigorous stylist and these selections from his private correspondence attest to his fluency with words.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Walter Isaacson's stellar biography, Einstein: His Life and Universe (Simon & Schuster), based on Einstein's newly released letters, is a tour d'horizon of the man, his achievements, his ideas and his forays into politics. Isaacson's grasp of Einstein's scientific theories is nothing short of masterful.

Hannah Arendt, the German-born philosopher and political theorist, is best known for The Origins of Totalitarianism and Eichmann in Jerusalem. Always a keen observer of Jewish affairs, she examined the underpinnings of assimilation, the nature of anti-Semitism, the arc of Jewish history and the evolution of Zionism, among the topics she addresses trenchantly in The Jewish Writings 1930-1975 (Schocken Books), edited by Jerome Kohn and Ron H. Feldman. In a companion volume, Why Arendt Matters (Yale University Press), Elisabeth Young-Bruehl, one of Arendt's students, reviews her major works and their relevance.

HIS PRIVATE THOUGHTS AND PUBLIC STANDS ON NATIONALISM, ZIONISM, WAR, PEACE, AND THE BOMB EDITED BY DAVID E. ROWE AND
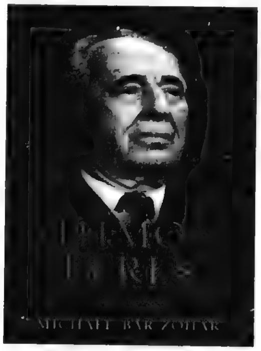
ROBERT SCHULMANN

Shimon Peres, twice Israel's prime minister and currently its president, has held more important jobs than any Israeli politician, bar none. Michael Bar-Zohar's sympathetic biography, Shimon Peres (Random House), is thorough, wide ranging and readable. Colin Shindler's slim primer, What Do Zionists Believe? (Raincoast Books), is instructive and illuminating. In The Question of Zion (Princeton University Press), anti-Zionist writer Jacqueline Rose presents a revisionist appraisal of the complexities of the Arab-Israeli conflict and concludes that Israel is in danger of destroying itself. And in Peace, Justice, And Jews (Bunim & Bannigan), left-of-centre Israeli and American essayists and poets offer their reflections on a wide assortment of contemporary issues, including Israel's struggle with the Palestinians. Everyday Jihad: The Rise of Militant Islam Among Palestinians in Lebanon (Harvard University Press), by Bernard Rougier, is a probing and timely account of a disturbing phenomenon based on the author's own observations and reading of documents.

Christopher D. Ringwald's intriguing A Day Apart (Oxford University Press) examines the Sabbath in Judaism, Islam and Christianity among three families. The Atlas of Religion (University of California Press), by Joanne O'Brien and Martin Palmer, is a pop survey, supplemented by clear maps, graphs and photographs, of the world's major faiths. In Holy Unexpected: My New Life as a Jew (Public Affairs), Robin Chotzinoff, raised by a Catholic mother and a Jewish father, comically relates her journey back to the fold.

The Jews of Windsor 1790-1990 (Dundurn Press) is a straightforward account of a venerable Canadian Jewish community whose numerical decline threatens its survival. Jonathan Elukin's Living Together, Living Apart: Rethinking Jewish-Christian Relations in the Middle Ages (Princeton University Press) challenges the standard view that this was a dark period for Jews. Jonathan Wilson, in Marc Chagall (Random House), analyzes his dazzling career as an artist, his attachment to a vanished past, his flight to Paris, his flirtation with communism and his relationship with Israel. Norman H. Finkelstein's accessible *American Jewish History (*The Jewish Publication Society) introduces us to the world's largest Jewish community. Catholics and Jews in Twentieth-Century America (University of Illinois Press), by Egal Feldman, charts the remarkable transformation of a relationship of enmity to one of coexistence. American foreign correspondent Ruth Gruber has had a full and stimulating life, and in Witness (Random House), peppered with sharp photographs of her travels around the globe, she recalls her experiences in the Jewish and non-Jewish worlds. Supermob (Raincoast Books), by Gus Russo, is the story of the controversial American Jewish lawyer Sidney Korshak, whose ties with labour unions and mobsters left him with an ambivalent reputation.



The tottering world of German Jewry is explored at length in *On Germans and Jews Under the Nazi Regime (*The Hebrew University Magnes Press), a volume of penetrating essays edited by the Israeli historian Moshe Zimmerman. The Forger (Raincoast Books), by Cioma Schonhaus, is the amazing tale of a young Jewish draftsman from Berlin who went into hiding and saved other Jews after the deportation of his family in 1942. Gunter Grass' memoir of his turbulent youth in Nazi and post-war Germany, Peeling the Onion (Raincoast Books) is bracing, eccentric, imaginative and altogether engaging. Richard and Adolf (Gefen), by Christopher Nicholson, is an examination of the influence of Richard Wagner's music and polemics on Adolf Hitler.

The Holocaust continues to generate a flood of books. Diane Wolf's Beyond Anne Frank: Hidden Children and Postwar Families in Holland (University of California Press) debunks the myth of Dutch resistance and tolerance. Benno Benninga's In Hiding: Surviving an Abusive "Protector" and the Nazi Occupation of Holland (Vallentine Mitchell) follows a similar route. Michael Englishman's 163256: A Memoir of Resistance (Wilfred Laurier University Press) turns on the author's survival as a Jew in wartime Holland. Montreal businessman and Holocaust survivor Hermann Gruenwald offers enduring lessons in survival in a forthright memoir, After Auschwitz: One Man's Story (McGill-Queen's University Press). Dov Freiberg, in *To Survive Sobibor (*Gefen), leaves a reader grappling with pain. In French Seduction (Carroll & Graf), Eunice Lipton paints a compelling picture of France's role in the persecution and deportation of Jews. Daniel Mendelsohn's The Lost: A Search for Six of Six Million (HarperCollins) is a riveting chronicle of history and memory. Johanna Krause: Twice Persecuted (Wilfred Laurier University Press), by Carolyn Gammon and Christiane Hemker, is about a Jewish woman from Dresden who was persecuted both by the Nazis and the Communists in prewar and postwar Germany.

In general: Zbigniew Brzezinski, in Second Chance (Perseus), delivers a critique of U.S. foreign policy since the late 1980s. In Security First (Yale University Press), Amitai Etzioni calls for a complete reorientation of American foreign policy, claiming that Washington's preoccupation with democratization is misplaced. Breaking News (Raincoast Books) is a first-rate, illustrated account of how the Associated Press news-gathering agency has covered the biggest international stories. The ancient world tantalizingly unfolds in two books published by the University of California, Rome (by Ada Gabucci) and Mesopotamia (by Enrico Ascalone). Toussaint Louverture (Pantheon), by Madison Smartt Bell, zeroes in on the first and only successful slave revolt, in 18th-century Haiti. Diana and Michael Preston's Taj Mahal (Raincoast Books) is a glowing, well-deserved tribute to an architectural wonder.

Lonely Planet's guidebooks are concise and informative. China, London, Paris, Istanbul, Hong Kong, Montreal & Quebec City, and Germany live up to expectations. Cooks will love the 25th anniversary edition of Silver Palate Cookbook (Workman), a classic work, and bakers will adore Dorie Greenspan's mouth-watering compendium, Baking From My Home To Yours (Houghton Mifflin). 100 Simple Secrets Why Dogs Make Us Happy (HarperCollins), by David Niven, will please canine lovers. Roger Angell, a distinguished writer for The New Yorker, has written an appealing autobiography in Let Me Finish (Raincoast Books).

“As soon as I saw the six bathrooms in it, I didn’t look at the rest of the house. I snapped it up right away. This is the biggest outhouse in Forest Hill Village, I figured.”

In the midst of the Depression Era, when Mirvish was only 15, his father passed away and the responsibility of providing for his mother Anna and two siblings, Robert and Lorraine, rested on his shoulders.

Mirvish dropped out of school to run the grocery store. Nine years later, he closed the unsuccessful store to work as a produce manager and buyer for Leon Weinstein, the founder of the Loblaw’s grocery chain.

Soon after, Mirvish met and fell in love with Anne Macklin, an artist and singer from Hamilton, Ont. They married and had a child, their only son, David.

In 1947, Mirvish cashed in his wife’s insurance policy to open a clothing store on Bloor, just west of Bathurst called The Sport Bar. After experiencing some success, he bought the neighbouring stores, and just a year later, a little clothing shop had expanded into Honest Ed’s.

He offered merchandise ranging from clothing to electronics, from housewares to beauty products, at discount prices. Torontonians flocked to Honest Ed’s, which also attracted the attention of tourists worldwide.

With possibly the world’s largest electric sign lit by thousands of light bulbs, and kitschy slogans peppered on the facing of the store, including “Welcome, don’t faint at our low prices, there’s no place to lie down,” and “Honest Ed’s is for the birds. Cheap. Cheap. Cheap,” the store has been a staple in the Annex for almost 60 years.

Between 1959 and 1963, Mirvish bought homes on Markham Street with the intention of tearing them down to build a parking lot, but when the city refused his request to do so, with the help and guidance of his artistic wife, he converted the buildings into art studios, galleries, restaurants and stores, and Mirvish Village was born.

“One of the things that made him so special and so endearing is that despite being a successful and savvy businessman, his motives were always about more than the bottom line. His philosophy was to keep prices reasonable so everyone could afford to shop at his store. And he always gave back to the community through his turkey giveaway and his annual birthday block party,” Miller said.

ROYAL ALEXANDRA THEATRE

Ed and son David in front of Toronto’s Royal Alex

In fact, his birthday parties, attended by thousands each year since his 80th birthday, were such a hit that the city made his birthday, July 24, “Ed Mirvish Day.”

Mirvish was also hailed as a philanthropist who gave away thousands of turkeys each Christmas to needy families who lined up for hours, and he was a staunch supporter of the Toronto Police.

Although running Honest Ed’s was his priority, in 1962, he set his sights on the deteriorating Royal Alexandra Theatre and decided to buy it for $215,000, then spent hundreds of thousands more to restore it.

This was the beginning of Mirvish’s reputation as a theatre impresario, and he is responsible for bringing productions such as Les Miserables and Mamma Mia to Toronto.

In 1982, Mirvish and his son, David, also purchased and renovated the Old Vic Theatre in London, England. He was made a Commander of the Order of the British Empire for saving the historic theatre.

Mirvish and his son continued to immerse themselves in the theatre industry when they built the Princess of Wales Theatre in 1993, which ran successful productions including The Phantom of the Opera and The Lion King.

During his lifetime, he received honorary degrees from five Canadian universities and Tel Aviv University, and was inducted into the Canadian and American Business Halls of Fame, the Order of Ontario and the Order of Canada.

His charm was unmistakable and his ambition was unmatched. In 1987, when he sat down with The CJN, Mirvish hoped he would never stop.

“Even though it’s against the Jewish religion, I’d rather like to have my remains put into a great big hour glass in the centre of my store. Three employees on eight-hour shifts would do nothing all day but turn the hourglass – That’s so customers will be able to point and say, ‘Look, there’s Ed. He’s still running,’ ” Mirvish said.

“The lights may have dimmed on Ed’s life, but his spirit and legacy have been indelibly burned into the fabric of Toronto,” Miller said.

In his honour, the City of Toronto lowered the flags at City Hall and the civic centres to half mast last Friday, on the day of Mirvish’s funeral.

The ball is squarely in Johnson's court

Helps to empower youth

By ABIGAIL BIMMAN
CJN Intern

Basketball player, youth mentor and father Daniel Moshe Johnson shoulders some heavy life experience on his six-foot-six frame.

A black Jew originally from New Orleans, Johnson has made aliyah. He has also played basketball internationally.

He now lives in Toronto with his son and daughter, where he heads a sports and mentoring program for the International Charity Association Network (ICAN).

He says his job is all about spreading "positivity" and empowering youth through the rules of the basketball game – on and off the court.

ICAN oversees various member charities and non-profit organizations, focusing on delivering food and other items and services to those in need. The sports and mentoring program is ICAN's main youth-oriented service.

The program targets high-crime areas in the Greater Toronto Area, and in the past few months, it has set up five basketball teams, mainly comprising immigrant youths.

"I'd like to reach out to more youths in the Jewish area," says Johnson. "I realize that a lot of youths are not used to seeing a darker representation of their own.

"To be in this uniform – our bodies represent uniforms – I see it as an honour, and my job is to express positivity," he says.

Adversity, Johnson says, has brought him closer to God.

In 1999, his immigration documents to Israel came through after a two-year wait, and he signed a contract with the Hapoel Galil Elyon basketball team. But he was prohibited from playing.

Johnson says he was told that the "Brisker Rule," instituted by the Israeli Basketball Association, had just come into effect. According to it, new citizens had to be Israeli residents for three years before joining premier league basketball teams. "I started to study and just learn the land and get involved in the community, and I turned away from basketball and got closer to God," says Johnson, adding that he does not want to speak negatively about the situation.

Lawyers and agents advised him that the Brisker Rule was unconstitutional. After a long journey that began by taking his story to the Israeli press, the rule was repealed.

However, when he agreed to a new contract with a B-level team, his mother phoned to tell him she had one year to live. Johnson spent his mother's remaining time with her in New Orleans – she lived one year to the day of her call.

He eventually settled in Toronto with his children, Don, now 13, and Wendy, 9. He and the children's mother separated two weeks after they had moved to Israel, and she currently lives in Toronto. Johnson has full custody. He considered moving the children to New Orleans, but then hurricane Katrina struck and their home was destroyed.

"We're grounded here. ICAN has been great," Johnson says. "Unless Jerusalem or Maccabi calls me and offers me a contract, we'll be here until then," he says, referring to Israeli basketball teams.

Daniel Moshe Johnson

Growing up in a family influenced by both monotheistic Judaism and the Pentecostal movement of the 1950s, Johnson had an Orthodox conversion in 1998 in Toronto so that he would have proof of his Jewish identity.

His ex-wife, Wendy, is an Ashkenazi Jew. His children have lost their Hebrew, which they learned after spending three years in Israel, but Johnson says they have a strong sense of their Jewish identity.

"They know their identity, they know who they are," he says, adding that unfortunately "assimilation often overweighs society."

He adds that when his children are older, he would like to return to Israel and study in a yeshiva.

Johnson's family observes holidays and some kashrut laws, and are associate members of Beth Tikvah Synagogue. More important to him, though, are what he considers Judaism's basic laws as stated in the Torah: respect for others and for human interactions.

"Tradition is beautiful, but the most important thing is being able to represent Torah every second, every minute," he says.

Johnson's professional basketball career includes stints on Malta and Ireland's teams. He played for the B'nai Brith Men's League in Toronto this past season.

His main connection with basketball these days, however, is through youth mentoring at ICAN.

"It's been working out because I'm enjoying this aspect of coaching and teaching the game as opposed to playing. I would love to continue playing, but right now we're here and the kids like it here, and we've reached a lot of youth [through ICAN]," he says.

Is being a black Jew a difficult minority to be a member of? "Not at all," he says.

"I've come to the point in my life where I thank God for having parents that educated me on certain images and what they represent in the world, and colour's not an obstacle," he says.

"I've been able to move beyond that because I've been able to receive love and brotherhood, and it has nothing to do with skin colour."

Johnson admits, however, that the community of black Jews is very small.

"I know 'Sammy Davis [Jr.],'" he says with a smile.

Animation school founder grounded in real world

By SHERI SHEFA
Staff Reporter

Ten years ago, the thought of opening an animation school was the last thing on her mind.

But when Maxine Schacker, an established artist who has exhibited in New York, Toronto and Montreal, realized that there was a growing demand for a comprehensive program for aspiring animators, she couldn't let the opportunity go.

This year, Schacker is celebrating the 10th anniversary of her Max the Mutt Animation School, which in 1997 began teaching students who have gone on to work on some of the most exciting animation projects to date.

Originally from Brooklyn, Schacker moved to Toronto in 1973 with her husband and five-year-old daughter.

"Toronto is what enabled me to pursue being an artist without sacrificing my child… If we stayed in New York, we would've had to decide to go after money," Schacker said.

After she spent years painting in her home and teaching painting part-time to supplement her income, in 1996, an affluent woman convinced her to share the rent for a space at 96 Spadina Ave. where she could paint.

"At that time, it was a very interesting building. It was full of art studios and a fun place."

But soon after, the woman she was sharing the rent with pulled out and left Schacker with a choice.

"There was no way I could afford the rent on my own. I could either go back to painting in my home, which is what I had done before, or I was going to have to raise more revenue."

Schacker said that if it weren't for the generosity of the affluent Jewish owner of the building, who granted her the space rent-free for three months to give her a chance to get on her feet, the school wouldn't exist today.

"I had friends who were artists who needed space to teach out of and students who were going to [art] schools who weren't happy and asked if I could help them find someone who could teach them this or that," she said.

"Life is funny. My plan at that age – 10 years ago, I was 55 – was to paint and teach a little. It certainly wasn't to have a school. There was an enormous need for this. It fell in my lap. I had the choice and the ability to do it."

She said that at the time, there weren't many options for people who wanted to study classical animation. She recalled being approached by many students who wanted to find someone who could teach them this craft.

Schacker eventually partnered with Tina Seeman, currently the schools' director of animation, whom Schacker met while teaching life drawing and anatomy part time.

"The need was there. It was unbelievable how much need for real training there was… We had something real to offer when people needed real skills, so it didn't matter if the building didn't look slick. They were getting what they needed there."

By 1998, Max the Mutt Animation School registered with the government and became a vocational school that offers diplomas in areas such as illustration for sequential arts, comic books and graphic novels, classical and computer animation, and 3D computer animation and production.

Soon after, the school moved into 952 Queen St. W., which is in the same complex as the Museum of Canadian Contemporary Art, and it now boasts a faculty of successful industry professionals.

Schacker said the way she runs the school is a reflection of the values she learned growing up in a Jewish community in New York.

"I grew up in New York in the Catskills in the summers at a time when really it was a mainly Jewish society. The things I was hearing and the values I was hearing – about the importance of community, the importance of education, the importance of people having a fair chance [have shaped me]," she said.

"We're really committed to trying to be accessible to talent and to quality and to character."

The school recently hired Stephen Barnes, who was a character animator on such computer animated films as Pixar's Toy Story 2, A Bug's Life and Monsters Inc. Dave Ross, who has drawn and written for such Marvel Comics such as Captain America and Daredevil, is also a member of the faculty.

Schacker said many of her graduates have landed jobs with animation companies such as Electronic Arts, a producer of computer and video games, Cuppa Coffee, a Toronto-based animation studio, and Sony Pictures Imageworks, which is responsible for the effects in films such as Spider-Man and Superman Returns.

Schacker attributes her students' success to the school's curriculum, which offers a balanced combination of traditional arts and technology.
